CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

in said channel over said outer bar be procured as aforesaid and maintained for two years thereafter for the width above named, $25,000 in addition shall be paid in manner aforesaid. The said C. P. Goodyear, his heirs and assigns, shall procure said work on said outer bar by the explosion of dynamite on the bottom of said channel or sunk beneath the bottom thereof, in his or their discretion, and not otherwise, and shall use the necessary auxiliary means for smoothing the bottom of the bar. The money necessary to carry out the provisions of this item is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no payments except the first, of $30,000, shall be made except upon a certificate of a majority of a board of officers, two of whom shall be officers of the Engineer Corps, detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of War, and the third shall be the Chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, that the said C. P. Goodyear, his heirs and assigns, have complied with all the conditions as to any of the depths and widths named or as to the maintenance of a depth of 26 feet accomplished in accordance with the provisions of this item.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, I think there ought to be some discussion of this item. It is an item proposing to make a donation to Mr. C. P. Goodyear of $30,000 under the following facts: In the last Congress Mr. Goodyear applied to the River and Harbor Committee of the House of Representatives for a contract to deepen the outer bar of the port of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia. He was to use a new means for accomplishing that result so far as the deepening of harbors was concerned.

He proposed to deepen the outer bar of Brunswick Harbor by the use of dynamite. He submitted a proposition to the River and Harbor Committee of the House of Representatives to do this work, and no money was to be paid him except upon the achievement of certain depths. If he did not attain those depths he was to receive nothing under his contract.

The bill making this contract was adopted and became a law. Mr. Goodyear undertook to carry out the terms of his contract to attain the depths referred to, but failed. He came back to the second session of the last Congress and submitted the matter anew to the River and Harbor Committee of the House of Representatives, admitting that he had not attained the depths which he had contracted with the Government to attain, but desiring the Government to pay him anyhow so much money for certain depths which he claimed to have attained, which were not the depths stipulated for in his contract.

The matter was considered by the River and Harbor Committee of the House of Representatives and they declined to recommend payment of any money to Mr. Goodyear for work not in compliance with the contract he had made with the Government, but they agreed—and that was accepted by him at the time—to extend the time for him to achieve the depths which he had started out to attain.

It was claimed on his behalf that he had been interfered with in the prosecution of his work by storms and adverse winds, and it seemed equitable that the time for him to accomplish this work should be extended. Accordingly another bill was passed by Congress, not in any way altering the original contract, but giving Mr. Goodyear additional time in which to do the work and attain the results which he had contracted with the Government to attain.

At the end of that second period of time Mr. Goodyear had not yet accomplished these results, and the depth called for in his contract remained unattained. The engineer officer, Capt. O. M. Carter, stationed at Savannah, submitted a report—and he was the officer upon whom it devolved to survey the work of Mr. Goodyear and report whether or not he had attained the results called for in his contract—and that report shows that Mr. Goodyear did not attain the depths contracted for. Mr. Goodyear, therefore, has not earned a single dollar under the contract made by him with the Government.

Now, Mr. Goodyear claims, or it is claimed on his behalf, that whereas he did not achieve the results for which his contract stipulated, he did achieve certain results, and that he ought to be paid for this.

If this were a private contract made between individuals, there would be no hesitation at all about it. Unless the contractor did the work and attained the results he undertook to attain he would receive no compensation.

But when it comes to the Government of the United States it is a different matter. The Government enters into a contract with an individual who undertakes to do certain things, in default of which he was to receive nothing. The trial is made by the contractor and failure results; those things which the contract called for, which the contractor was to do, in default of which he was to receive no compensation, are not accomplished. Yet is seems the Government must pay anyhow. We reverse the rule which would obtain between individuals; and Mr. Goodyear must be paid for the partial execution of his contract, when in fact he stipulated with the Government that if he did not execute the contract according to its terms he was to receive nothing.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if what Mr. Goodyear has done has not improved navigation at that point?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Not according to the report of the engineer, as I understand it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President——

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GORDON. I will wait until the Senator concludes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But I am not. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota, familiar perhaps with the last report made by the engineer in charge. The point is this: Had Mr. Goodyear obtained the depths which his contract called for, there would not be any necessity for the incorporation of $30,000 in this bill to pay him, for the reason that the law awarding him the contract appropriated the funds required to meet the payments under his contract.

The Secretary of War could warrant for the money whenever the engineer officer reported that Goodyear had achieved the results which would entitle him to the money. The Secretary of War never certified to the Secretary of the Treasury that Mr. Goodyear had earned anything; no warrant was drawn in favor of Mr. Goodyear for the money which was appropriated in the act authorizing the contract, for the reason that Goodyear had not earned anything under the terms of his contract.

Under the operation of the law awarding the contract not a single cent has gone out of the Treasury in compensation for this work simply because the engineer officer and the War Department report that Mr. Goodyear had not achieved the results called for in his contract. And it is because he can not be paid out of the money appropriated in the law awarding him the contract that he comes before the Senate Committee on Commerce and obtains the incorporation in the river and harbor bill of this proposition.

Improving the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., $30,000, the whole of which shall be paid to C. P. Goodyear for depth of water heretofore obtained over said outer bar.

I repeat that this is giving $30,000 to Mr. Goodyear on the idea, I suppose, that he has some equity growing out of the contract made by him with the Government—a contract never complied with by him.

If we are going to embark upon that kind of legislation, the sooner it is known the better. If the Government is going to hold out that it will contract with a man to do certain things, and those things are to be done before he is to receive a dollar, and yet when those things are not done we pay anyhow upon the idea that perhaps the contractor is entitled to some equity consideration, then it ought to be known, so that the Government will be more particular in future in making contracts with individuals.

Mr. PLATT. Do I understand this to be the position of the Senator, that when, under a contract, the Government has received from an individual a beneficial result it will pay nothing, under any circumstances, because the contract has not been fully completed according to its letter?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say, in answer to the Senator from Connecticut, that I believe the Government ought to deal with its contractors like individuals deal with those who contract with them. There is no claim against the Government whatever, which is enforceable in law, growing out of this contract; because the terms of the contract, on the part of Mr. Goodyear, have not been complied with.

Mr. PLATT. I understand the law as between individuals to be, that where a person has received a substantial benefit from a contract, and has accepted the work, or has availed himself of the work, he is bound to pay what in equity is due.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Undoubtedly that is true where the work is accepted by the other party, or he has availed himself of the benefit resulting from the work. But the engineer officer in charge of Brunswick Harbor does not report that Mr. Goodyear has obtained any of the depths which he contracted to obtain, and the United States Government has never accepted the work.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to know if ships can go there which could not go there before?

Mr. GORDON. That is the question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is an affirmation on behalf of Mr. Goodyear and his friends, denied by the engineer in charge, who thinks that whatever greater depths may be there now, are not the result of Goodyear's experiments.

I understand the remainder of this clause makes another contract with Mr. Goodyear. Is that correct?

Mr. GORDON. It is.

Mr. BLANCHARD. To that I have no objection at all.

Mr. WALSH. Did I understand the Senator from Louisiana to say that Capt. Carter denied that vessels drawing several feet more water could pass the bar than before the improvement was made?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I stated that the engineer does not admit or believe that the increase of depth at the outer bar is traceable to Goodyear's work on the bar. Mr. Goodyear's work of blasting by means of dynamite was on a part of the bar distant perhaps as much as a quarter of a mile, maybe further, from the channel over the bar used by the ships.

Mr. Goodyear claims that his work by dynamite blasts thus remote from the ship channel had the effect of deepening this channel in which, or on that part of which, he was not working. This the engineer does not admit at all. There may have been a deepening of the bar in the channel, admitting ships to the inner harbor at Brunswick, but not, I understand, at the point where this dynamiting on the part of Mr. Goodyear took place.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Louisiana will allow me, I will state for his information that I have given this matter a good deal of attention. There are innumerable affidavits from masters of ships testifying that as the result of Goodyear's work in deepening the bar vessels drawing 3 feet more water are enabled to cross in safety in and out over Brunswick bar than formerly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will ask the Senator from Georgia before he takes his seat what the engineer officer in charge reports.

Mr. WALSH. I have his report here.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me right there to give an answer to that question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. I shall at the proper time, when I can get the floor, make a very brief but a very complete answer, I think. I believe it will be esteemed in the judgment of the Senate to be a complete answer to all the Senator from Louisiana has said. But on the immediate point as to what the engineer says, as the Senator from Louisiana asks for it, I beg to call attention to a letter addressed to the Senator himself by this very engineer officer.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What is the date of it?

Mr. GORDON. It was addressed to the Senator from Louisiana February 17, 1893. I myself have the original letter. The engineer, Capt. Carter, on this identical point uses these words in a letter addressed to the Senator:

> Over what was the crest of the bar in 1891, with a minimum low-water depth of 11.2 feet, there exists at present a channel 100 feet in width with a minimum low-water depth of 14 feet.

That is over the signature of the engineer.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not see that that proves anything.

Mr. GORDON. I will show when I get the floor.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What was the depth before Mr. Goodyear undertook the improvement?

Mr. GORDON. The engineer said it was 11.2 feet.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I did not catch it when read.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, yes. The engineer says:

> Over what was the crest of the bar in 1891, with a minimum low-water depth of 11.2 feet, there exists at present a channel 100 feet in width with a minimum low water depth of 14 feet.

Making just two-tenths less than 3 feet increase in depth.

Mr. BLANCHARD. As I before stated, the channel is some distance, perhaps a quarter of a mile from where Mr. Goodyear was blasting with dynamite. The engineer reports a depth over the bar, it is true, but not in the Goodyear channel, as I understand it. It was some distance away from it. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that in company with the engineer I, in April, 1893, examined this work and saw where the channel was that ships use and had pointed out where Mr. Goodyear was dynamiting some distance off. I think the depth to which the engineer alludes is in the channel that the ships have been using and not where Mr. Goodyear had been using dynamite as a means of blasting a channel.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator from Louisiana is simply mistaken, that is all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not know that the Senator from Georgia has himself visited that work.

Mr. GORDON. It is at my old home, and I know a great deal more about it than does the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not doubt that the Senator knows more about the locality than I do.

Mr. GORDON. And more about its people.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have no doubt as to that; I do not question it at all. That is not pertinent to this discussion. I say I visited the locality and personally examined this very work in April, 1893. I merely desired to know of my friend if he had visited it in person.

Mr. GORDON. I have.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The printed reference to a letter from the engineer officer to me, alluded to by the Senator from Georgia, I find, on looking at it, to be as follows:

> In letter to Hon. N. C. BLANCHARD, chairman River and Harbor Committee, House of Representatives, in relation to the deepening of Brunswick's outer bar, Georgia (original placed in hands of Senator JOHN B. GORDON and copy filed with Committee on Commerce, United States Senate), Capt. O. M. Carter, United States Engineers, etc., under date of Savannah, Ga., February 17, 1893, states: "Over what was the crest of the bar in 1891, with a minimum low water depth of 11.2 feet, there exists at present a channel 100 feet in width with a minimum low-water depth of 14 feet."

That embodies an extract of three lines and a fraction merely from a letter to me.

Mr. GORDON. I have the original here.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the original letter were produced, and all of it read, perhaps it would state what Capt. Carter stated to me, that this increased depth, this difference between 11.2 and 14 feet was in the immediate ship channel, and not in the place, or near it even, where Mr. Goodyear had been blasting.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator from Louisiana is entirely mistaken. The old ship channel was filled in by the sinking of vessels and navigation made absolutely impracticable. We had no channel until Mr. Goodyear pounded it out by dynamite. The testimony of every leading citizen in that city, its mayor, its council, every pilot upon the bar, all of the shippers from that point of lumber and heavy material, all the owners of ships going in and out, the governor of the State, both the Senators from the State, every member of Congress from the State, every leading citizen within the State, and every member of both houses of the Legislature of the State, stand here to deny those statements. That is all I wish to say at present.

Mr. BLANCHARD. And in reply to the assertion of the Senator from Georgia, I will state that the River and Harbor Committee of the other House had Capt. Carter before them at the time when Mr. Goodyear made application for payment of the very amount which is included in this bill, and examined him touching this very matter. Capt. Carter stated to the committee, with his maps to point it out, that the depths which up to that time had been achieved were not near the line where Mr. Goodyear had been blasting with dynamite.

After hearing Capt. Carter, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors declined to recommend a payment to Mr. Goodyear, but did recommend an extension of the time for the execution of his contract. That extension has long since expired and still the terms of the contract remain unfulfilled.

Mr. BRICE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say in confirmation of what has been stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON], that I have been interested, in a business way, at Brunswick, Ga., for many years. I am perfectly familiar with that bar and that port. I have been over it many times; once last year, about the time of which the Senator from Louisiana speaks. I concur with the Senator from Georgia. I should regret to know or believe that an engineer officer had made a statement which threw any doubt upon the right of Mr. Goodyear to this compensation. I should regard him as unfit for the service. I should think there was something wrong with an army officer who would throw any obstacle in the way of Mr. Goodyear's obtaining this compensation.

I am perfectly familiar with the bar, with the port, with the whole subject. I know it was through Mr. Goodyear's efforts and the expenditure of his money, which he does not get back by this appropriation or anywhere near it, that the bar has been deepened so that commerce is possible. Formerly it was not. I know that of my own personal knowledge and experience.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me at that point to add a word to what the Senator from Ohio says?

The Senate will appreciate the fact that not one solitary dollar has ever been spent by the Government upon this bar. Yet the Senator from Louisiana stands here, while millions have been spent by the Government on rivers in his State, in many cases without obtaining 2 inches of depth scarcely, and absolutely denies this man, who spent $50,000 in getting us 3 feet of water, by the testimony of every citizen of Brunswick, the right to this compensation. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana does not know more about that bar than I do. It is at my old home, and I know all about it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Senator from Georgia does me an injustice. I know, however, he does not intend that.

Mr. GORDON. Certainly not.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There is no Senator on this floor for whom I have greater reverence than for the Senator from Georgia. I never pretended to know more about this matter than the Senator from Georgia. I merely stated I knew a good deal about it; that it had been examined twice by the River and Harbor Committee of the other House, of which I was a member, and that I had once visited it in person.

I wish to assure my friend from Georgia that his remark about my opposing the appropriation of money by Congress for the purpose of improving the harbor of Brunswick is altogether wrong. I would gladly vote with him hundreds of thousands of dollars to improve the port of Brunswick. It is an enterprising, promising town. I have been there; and I am prepared now to vote, as I have done in the past, for appropriations for the improvement of Brunswick Harbor.

Mr. GORDON. On what plan?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that there has been work going on in the inner harbor of Brunswick, improving it. It has been going on for years, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce knows.

Every river and harbor act for years past has carried appropriations for the improvement of Brunswick Harbor. There is such an appropriation now in the bill without regard to the Goodyear appropriation. Two years ago, or perhaps a little more, we showed our desire, and I was one of them, to improve the harbor further by granting this contract to Mr. Goodyear to deepen the outer harbor. So we have two works going on at Brunswick—one in the inner harbor, one on the outer bar.

Now, when the Senator from Georgia says that I have received large appropriations for rivers in my own State and that it comes with bad grace from me to be opposing this appropriation, he is avoiding the point at issue.

Mr. GORDON. Not at all.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The point at issue is not that I am opposing liberal appropriations for Brunswick Harbor. On the contrary, I favor liberal appropriations for work both on the outer bar and the inner harbor at Brunswick.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to say a word at this time?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. I shall not speak about myself. The Senators from Georgia know how extremely particular I have been in reference to this appropriation. I desire to say to the Senator from Louisiana that at a comparatively low cost, certainly not one-fifth of what the army engineers estimate, Mr. Goodyear proposes to deepen the outer harbor at Brunswick.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I am not finding fault at all with the new contract. It is only to the payment of the $30,000 for work heretofore done that I object.

Mr. RANSOM. The citizens of Brunswick, the Chamber of Commerce, I can not say all the people of Georgia, but I will say both the Senators representing the State here——

Mr. GORDON. The Senator from North Carolina may say the whole Legislature and the Governor.

Mr. RANSOM. And the members of the House of Representatives have all been before the Committee on Commerce and asked us to adopt the low-priced plan of Mr. Goodyear to deepen the harbor, and we have simply done it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I stated, perhaps when he was not here——

Mr. RANSOM. I heard the Senator; I was here.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I stated that I find no fault whatever with the clause which awards a new contract to Mr. Goodyear to obtain depths. It is useless to talk about that matter, because I am not attacking it.

Mr. RANSOM. Very good; I am very glad to hear it. Now let us go to the other point for one moment.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The payment of $30,000 on an alleged quantum meruit when there was a contract. That is the point at issue.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to get along with the bill. The report of the Army engineer, Capt. Carter, will show that he admits a certain deepening of the harbor in parts of it. Every pilot—I say every pilot because that is the statement made—who takes his vessel into that harbor says it has been deepened from 2 to 3 and 4 feet. The Chamber of Commerce of Brunswick, the Senators from Georgia, the members of the House of Representatives, the newspapers state, and Mr. Goodyear has stated upon his honor, that the harbor has been deepened to a certain extent. Although he has not literally complied with his contract and in law could not enforce it against the Government, yet in equity he has complied with it.

The harbor has been substantially deepened from 2 to 3 feet. It is roughly done; it is inartistically done, but it is substantially done. Under these considerations the Committee on Commerce of the Senate thought it was right to pay Mr. Goodyear the sum of $30,000 for doing a work which it would have cost the Government $500,000 to have accomplished.

Now, one word further. Mr. Goodyear has had to encounter floods upon floods in the river and in the harbor. During one or two seasons he has had to encounter yellow fever in its worst form. He has had to encounter one or two or three broken banks, by which he has suffered. That is the case; and the Committee on Commerce said he ought to have the $30,000 for the work he has done and be enabled to go on with the improvement.

I hope the Senator from Louisiana will let us go on with the bill. I hope he will allow us to take a vote on the amendment, and then go on with the bill. This matter will go into conference, as he well knows. It will there be considered by the conferees on the part of the other House and the conferees on the part of the Senate. It is very late in the hot days of July; it is sweltering here. Let us go on with the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the Senator from North Carolina will allow me a little further, I will agree to his proposition and let the consideration of the bill proceed without even making a motion.

Mr. RANSOM. All right.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am quite willing for it to go into conference and be considered by the House conferees and the Senate conferees. But I wish to state briefly that the contention of the Senators that there has been a deepening somewhere in the harbor of Brunswick should not be permitted to obscure the real question involved in the first four lines of the clause to which I have referred.

It is conceded here that Mr. Goodyear has no claim whatever in law against the Government growing out of the terms of his contract with the Government, because he has not achieved the results he contracted to achieve. Senators talk about depths which have been achieved, and that there is an equity existing which entitles Mr. Goodyear to consideration to the extent of paying him $30,000.

Mr. President, this appropriation, when you boil it down, is nothing more or less than a donation which the Senate proposes to make to Mr. Goodyear. Senators know that there is not a court in this land which would award a cent to Mr. Goodyear if he were to enter suit upon the contract to recover pro tanto because of the depth achieved in the channel. Mr. Goodyear is a man capable of contracting with the Government, and did contract with the Government. He did contract with the Government to do certain work, and if he did not do that work he was not to receive any compensation.

Mr. Goodyear went ahead and did, we will admit for the sake of argument, a part of the work under the terms of the contract. But by his own contract he agreed to ask nothing for such partial execution. He could not recover at law, and yet we propose here to-day to pay him $30,000. Do we owe it? No. Then it must be a donation. He has no just claim against the Government for $30,000. We are donating to him $30,000 on the statement made on his behalf that whereas he did not do the work which he contracted with the Government to do, he did part of the work, not enough to get a single cent under the terms of his contract. Yet he ought to be paid, anyhow. That is the proposition submitted here.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTON. I understand from the Senator's remarks that Mr. Goodyear has done a certain portion of the work. I desire to know from the Senator whether that portion of the work done by Mr. Goodyear is worth $30,000?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is claimed on the part of Mr. Goodyear that he has done certain work. As I understand the engineer's report, the engineer does not admit that this deepening in the harbor is the result of the blasting done by Mr. Goodyear along certain lines where he was engaged in blasting. Whether the work done by Goodyear is worth the sum proposed to be paid, I know not. The officer of the Government does not say so, as far as I am informed.

I do not know of any recent report upon this work submitted by the engineer which shows different results from those given by Capt. Carter when he was before the River and Harbor Committee of the House, to which I have alluded.

As I understood Capt. Carter then, he denied that the deepening in the harbor was any more traceable to the blasting done by Mr. Goodyear some distance away from the channel used by the ships, than it was to the action of ocean currents.

Mr. President, all Government contractors upon public buildings and all Govevernment contractors in every branch of the Government service are required to fulfill the letter of their contract before they are paid, but here we are reversing that rule, and we are paying Mr. Goodyear $30,000 when he has not at all complied—it is not even claimed that he has complied with the letter of his contract.

I felt it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to this proposition to pay Mr. Goodyear the $30,000. It occurred to me Congress was setting a precedent that would return in the future to trouble it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I should be willing for the Senate to vote at this instant without one word of reply. I think I know the Senate of the United States. If the proposition made by the Senator from Louisiana were admitted to be true (which I deny), namely, that Mr. Goodyear was not legally entitled to a dollar, there would still remain a moral obligation upon the Government whatever amount his achievement is worth to the country's commerce. I dissent entirely from the Senator's view of Government's obligations to its citizens.

Sir, upon his principle of standing always and only upon the contract, no Union soldier could ever draw a pension under this Government. They entered into a contract to fight for the Union for a few dollars per month, and now the Senator would stand here upon that principle and say to them: "Soldiers of the Union, you agreed to fight for so much per month and we must stand on the contract. You can not be paid pensions, for that is not the contract." That is the Senator's position.

No, Mr. President, commerce has received the benefit of Mr. Goodyear's work and commerce or the country owes him for it. He has spent $50,000 of his own money in deepening that bar, and he has achieved a success at a cost which under no other system has ever been attained. Indeed, sir, it has cost to reach such result elsewhere more than ten times the amount of money which the Commerce Committee have agreed to pay him.

The Senator from Louisiana says that this is a donation at the instance of the Georgia Senators. He will pardon some warmth in my reply to that charge. Mr. President, the Senators from Georgia, and the Senators who occupy honorable positions on the Commerce Committee, are not in the habit of taking donations from the United States Treasury. I repel such a charge, and am amazed that the Senator could indulge in such criticism of the committee and of his brother Senators. Donations! Mr. President, we stand upon the principle of "quantum meruit;" and if this Mr. Goodyear received justice the appropriation would be doubled and quadrupled.

The Senator says he knows that bar. Mr. President, I lived there for some years. My friends live there. I know the citizens of that city. A more honorable people never lived. Their board of trade, their mayor, their councilmen, the pilots, the shippers, the owners of the vessels which cross the bar, the surgeon sent down by the Government, all testify to his success, and that Mr. Goodyear has obtained this depth of water claimed, and that it would be an outrage to send him away penniless. He has opened to us commerce there that was locked out from that harbor.

Only two years ago ships lay in that harbor for month after month, unable to cross the bar, drawing 19 feet of water. Now the Great Erin only a few days ago was carried out, drawing 22 feet 3 inches of water. This, sir, is the identical ship that was tied there with 19 feet of draft and could not get out before Mr. Goodyear deepened the bar by use of dynamite.

Now, Mr. President, such attack, I must repeat, is not entirely becoming to a Senator from another State. My colleague and myself ought to represent Georgia. We are sent here for that purpose. We are not misrepresenting our State. The Senator is mistaken. The governor of that State and every member of her Legislature are before this body by petition asking us to grant Mr. Goodyear this money for his expenditures. Even then he gets only about half what he has paid out for the benefit of the Government. I repeat, if we paid him every dollar of the $50,000 we would not compensate him for the amount of benefit he has conferred upon the commerce of this country.

But, Mr. President, it is idle with such testimony as has been before this committee for me to dwell upon this subject. This is an intelligent committee; the gentlemen composing it have heard all the argument; they understand the whole case, and they recommend this appropriation. I stand upon the report of the committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, there is no occasion for the Senator from Georgia to get up any feeling over this matter. I am sure there is none on my part. No Senator would surpass me in promptness of action to benefit the people of the State of Georgia by the improvement of their ports or rivers, or in any other legitimate way. Nor have I in anything I have said knowingly misrepresented the Senators from Georgia or the people of that Commonwealth, as claimed by my friend.

I simply present the cold question of policy here, whether or not we are going to pay $30,000 to a gentleman who contracted with the Government to do certain things, and agreed if he did not do them he was to receive nothing—whether we are going to pay him anyhow under a contract which it is admitted even by his advocates he has not complied with.

It is no attack upon my part on the people of Brunswick or the Senators from Georgia or Mr. Goodyear. I have met Mr. Goodyear personally. I think well of him. I believe he is a worthy gentleman and a good lawyer. But that has nothing to do with this question. What the Legislature of Georgia has done in the way of memorializing Congress to pay Mr. Goodyear, or what Mr. Goodyear's neighbors have done in the way of sending petitions up here to Congress and to their Senators asking that Mr. Goodyear be paid, has nothing to do with the cold question which I have presented.

Is the Senate of the United States, as one of the coördinate legislative branches of the Government, going to make a contract with a man to do certain things and accomplish certain results, and when he does not do those things and does not accomplish those results, and comes in here and admits that he has not done it, are we going to pay him anyhow? That is the question which presents itself to the Senate.

I am very sorry that my friend from Georgia has exhibited any feeling over this matter. There was no occasion for it. Surely a Senator may be permitted to present his view of a public question without its being considered that he is inspired by personal pique, or personal animosity, or personal feeling towards anybody connected with this subject-matter of dispute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of the clause on page 47, line 14.

Mr. HARRIS. On page 47, line 14, I desire to submit an amendment in relation to the Cumberland River below Nashville, which will take but a few moments. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, line 14, after the word "improvement," it is proposed to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$50,000, of which sum $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be made available for the location and construction of a lock and dam near the mouth of the Harpeth River."

Mr. HARRIS. The object and purpose of that amendment is that at the mouth of the Harpeth River there are shoals. A lock and a dam at that point would remedy the evil there and make the river navigable from its mouth to Nashville throughout the entire year to the heavier draft steamers. It is a thing of vital importance to the commerce of that portion of the country.

I think it probable that my amendment perhaps goes $5,000 beyond the estimates for the lock and dam, and I am willing to modify it so as to make the amount "$45,000" instead of "$50,000," so as to bring it within the estimates for the lock and dam, for which the amendment proposes to provide.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Tennessee has shown his usual courtesy and consideration in this matter. He brought the subject before the Committee on Commerce, and until he called my attention to it this evening I supposed that that amendment had been adopted by the committee. There is no objection to it.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand the Senator proposes to reduce the amount to $45,000.

Mr. HARRIS. I modify the amendment by making the amount "$45,000," instead of "$50,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The amendment will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 47, line 19, after the word "may," to insert "in the discretion of the Secretary of War;" and in line 24, after the word "sum," to strike out "so much as may be necessary shall be used in making a survey of the river below Riverton, and submitting plans for its improvement," and insert "Ninety thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used in the removal of snags and other obstructions to navigation between Riverton and the mouth of said Tennessee River, and the remainder of said sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used in making a survey of said Tennessee River below Riverton, and submitting plans for its improvement;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Tennessee River below Chattanooga, Tenn: Continuing improvement, $400,000, of which $25,000 may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be used in continuing the work at Livingston Point, Ky., and $10,000 in improving the river between Hobbs Island and Guntersville, and $100,000 below Riverton, of which last sum $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used in the removal of snags and other obstructions to navigation between Riverton and the mouth of said Tennessee River, and the remainder of said sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used in making a survey of said Tennessee River below Riverton and submitting plans for its improvement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 21, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Kentucky River, Kentucky: Continuing improvement, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill will not insist upon the Senate remaining here longer. This has been a long, hot day; it is now after 6 o'clock, and I think the Senate had better adjourn.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not propose to impose upon the Senate this evening. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that I only wish to get the bill far enough so that we can dispose of it without much delay to-morrow. It is now very late in the session; this is the 12th day of July; the weather is very hot, and there are a number of appropriation bills to be yet disposed of. The tariff bill is also to come back from conference, unquestionably, and we have a great deal to do. I hope the Senate will stay with me until the bill has reached a position when we can certainly get through with it to-morrow.

I tell the Senator from Louisiana that I do not desire, and have no purpose, to cut off amendments or debate. The bill will be left in that position for to-morrow. That is all I can say about it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is now quarter past 6 o'clock.

Mr. RANSOM. The atmosphere in the Chamber is much more pleasant now than it has been at any time since we have been in session to-day.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am willing to stay here until half past 6. If the Senator will not consent to that, I think we ought to adjourn now.

Mr. RANSOM. I shall be satisfied if the Senate shall stay here until 7 o'clock. I hope the Senator from Louisiana will not be so exacting after what I have said.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think this bill ought to be considered properly. I do not think we ought to rush through the Senate a bill like this, carrying as it does, fifteen, sixteen, or eighteen million dollars. There will be plenty of time to consider the bill to-morrow.

Mr. RANSOM. I tell the Senator from Louisiana that no attempt will be made this evening to hurry the bill through. It will be left open to the offering of amendments to-morrow. It is now only quarter past 6 o'clock, and I hope the Senator from Louisiana will not press for an adjournment but let us proceed with the bill until 7 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed, unless some motion is made.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think we ought not to be required to stay here any longer than half-past 6 o'clock on a hot day like this. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I suggest, Mr. President, that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana suggests that there is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Louisiana will do himself a wrong to pursue such a course upon this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from North Carolina that the absence of a quorum having been suggested, nothing is in order but the calling of the roll.

Mr. RANSOM. I understand; but I beg permission to say that I shall not be guilty of putting the Senate to inconvenience, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 13, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 12, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

IMPROVEMENT OF MINNESOTA RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to House resolution dated June 28, 1894, reports received since the last annual report of the Secretary of War pertaining to the improvement of the Minnesota River, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ADMISSION OF UTAH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, with Senate amendments.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take the floor, and yield to the gentleman from Utah to make the motion that the House concur in the Senate amendments, simply with this remark that "Westward the brilliant star of empire gloriously takes its flight." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Utah, to concur in the Senate amendments. If there be no objection the vote will be taken on those amendments in gross. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

COUNTY BUILDING, COCONINO COUNTY, ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7506) authorizing the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds for the construction of a county building at the county seat thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "twenty" and insert "ten;" so as to read "in not less than two nor more than ten years."

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I would like to have action on these amendments now. I move that they be concurred in.

The amendments were read, as follows:

On page 1, line 8, strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen;" so as to read, "for advertising, $19,000."

On page 3 strike out lines 17 and 18, as follows: "For advertising at first and second-class post-offices, $15,000."

On page 3, in line 23, after the word "routes," insert "including temporary service to newly established offices;" so as to read, "inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service to newly established offices, $6,000,000."

On page 3, in line 23, strike out all after the word "dollars" down to and including "contemplated" on page 4, line 2.

On page 8, after line 2, insert "for payment of rewards for detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars and robbers, $10,000."

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the general effect of these amendments is to reduce the amount of the appropriations in the bill $4,000, and the reduction is arrived at in this way, the House recommended a new item of $15,000 for advertising at first and second class post-offices. That amount was allowed to the First Assistant Postmaster-General——

Mr. COOMBS. Advertising what?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Advertising letters and other mail matter. The Senate struck out this new item and added $1,000 to the amount heretofore allowed the Postmaster-General for the same purposes: that is, increasing the item from $18,000 to $19,000. In addition to that, the Senate recommends a new item of $10,000 for payment of rewards for the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars and robbers. This is the first time that so few alterations have been made in the House bill by the Senate. I think we had better concur in these amendments.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to put one inquiry to the gentleman. He states that the Senate has struck out the new item which the House inserted. Will he state why that insertion was made in the House; and if the insertion was justifiable, why he would now have us consent to the striking out?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The item was inserted at the request of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, who stated that in his opinion it was necessary. We thought it a proper item. There was some opposition to it on account of its being a new item; but the committee reported it, and the House agreed to it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it not the purpose of the item to publish in the great cities the departures of the foreign mails, etc.?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I suppose that will be included, but the item was intended for general advertising purposes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not that the great part?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I do not think it is.

Mr. BINGHAM. I make no objection, if the gentleman feels that we ought to lose that item.

Mr. AITKEN. Are there any changes made in the bill as to the classification of mail matter?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No, sir; none at all. For information I submit the following statement:

POSTAL SERVICE, 1895.

The bill exceeds the act for 1894	3,232,285.33

The changes in the amounts appropriated by the bill, as passed the House and amended by the Senate, are as follows, viz:

For payment of rewards for detection, etc., of post-office burglars and robbers	10,000.00
Total increase	11,000.00

REDUCTION BY SENATE.

For advertising for first and second class post-offices, office of First Assistant Postmaster-General	15,000.00
Net reduction in bill as it passed Senate	4,000.00

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no separate vote be demanded on these amendments, the vote will be taken in gross.

The question being taken, the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REGISTER FOR SCHOONER BARGE ASTORIA.

Mr. CLANCY. I ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of a bill passed yesterday—the bill (H. R. 7197) to provide a register for the schooner barge Astoria. My object is to make an amendment for the purpose of correcting an error in the bill. I desire to have struck out in line 4 the words "foreign built."

By unanimous consent, the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. CLANCY was read, as follows:

In line 4, strike out the words "foreign built," before the word "ship."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLANCY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WILLIAM J. AND JOSEPH M. CORNELL.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 73) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its present consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $800, $400 of which shall be paid to William J. Cornell on account of an overpayment of that sum to the receiver of the United States land office at Lagrande, Oregon, on land entry numbered 4298, for the southern half of section 27, township 3 north, of range 30 east, and $400 thereof to Joseph M. Cornell, on account of an overpayment by him of that sum to said receiver, on land entry numbered 4292, for the north half of section 27, township 3 north, range 30 east, said entries having been made under the third section of the act of September 29, 1890, and said parties having been by mistake of the officers of said land office required to pay $2.50 per acre instead of the legal price thereof, namely, $1.25 per acre.

Mr. SAYERS. Before consent is given for the consideration of this bill, I would like to have the report read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from Oregon, after which the Chair will ask if there is objection to the consideration of the bill.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 73) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises are stated in Senate Report No. 18, Fifty-third Congress, first session, made September 4, 1893, from the Senate Committee on Public Lands, to accompany this bill, a copy of which report is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

Your committee concur in the conclusions stated and recommendations made in that report, and recommend that this bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 18, Fifty-third Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred Senate bill 73, have examined the same, and recommend that the bill be passed.

The committee adopt the report of the committee upon a similar bill at the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1149, Fifty-second Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3849) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell, have examined the same, and report that the bill be passed as amended.

William J. Cornell was required by the register of the land office at La Grande, Oregon, to pay $2.50 per acre on land entry No. 4298, for the south half of section 27, township 3 north, of range 30 east; and Joseph M. Cornell was required to pay $2.50 per acre on land entry No. 4292, for the north half of section 27, township 3 north, range 30 east, when the legal price of the same was $1.25 per acre, as will appear by letters of the Commissioner of the General Land Office hereto attached and made a part hereof.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office holds that the overpayments can not be refunded under existing laws.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C. December 20, 1892.

SIR: In reference to the matter of the application of William J. Cornell for return of $1.25 per acre on cash entry La Grande, Oregon, No. 4292, for the S. ½ sec. 27, T. 3 N., R. 30 E., which was denied by my predecessor in letter to the register and receiver at La Grande, of October 1, 1891, being the subject of your late inquiry, I have the honor to state that the case in question appears to be governed by the principles of the decision of the Secretary of the Interior in the case of Joseph Brown (5 L. D., 317), which holds that the Department is not clothed with power to make repayments except by specific statutory authorization.

The existing legislation providing for repayments in cases where parties have paid double minimum prices for land which has been found not to be within the limits of a railroad land grant, viz, the act of June 16, 1880 (21 Stats., 287), does not apply so as to cover a case of this kind in which the land is actually within the limits of a railroad land grant. I can not, therefore, do otherwise than adhere to the conclusion of my predecessor above mentioned.

The copy of his letter of October 1, 1891, is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

W. M. STONE, Commissioner.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1892.

SIR: In answer to your verbal inquiry of this date, in the matter of the claim of William J. Cornell and Joseph Cornell, respectively, for repayment of $1.25 per acre, paid on certain entries made at La Grande, Oregon, I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter addressed to the register and receiver, La Grande, relative to the case of William J. Cornell, dated October 1, 1891. A similar letter was written on October 3, 1891, in the case of Joseph Cornell.

Very respectfully,

M. M. ROSE, Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 1, 1891

GENTLEMEN: Referring to your letter of the 14th ultimo, transmitting application of William J. Cornell for return of $1.25 per acre on cash entry No. 4292, for the S. ½ sec. 27, twp. 3 N., R. 30 E., you are advised that said entry was made under the third section of the act of September 29, 1890, and the party should have only been required to pay $1.25 per acre. But the party paid $2.50 per acre, making a total of $800, under the impression of your office that the land was double minimum in price.

This land was within the granted limits of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad, from Wallula to Tacoma, which road has been constructed. By the act of September 29, 1890, the land within the granted limits of the unconstructed portion of the Northern Pacific Railroad was forfeited to the United States.

As the Cascade Branch has been constructed, the railroad company took as a moiety the alternate odd sections from 1 to 5, etc., but the vacant lands within the limits of said branch were only subject to entry at the price of $2.50 per acre, except to parties coming under the third section of said act, and the party should have entered the land at $1.25 per acre.

The amount overpaid on said entry can not be refunded under the act of June 16, 1880, as said act provided, "In all cases where parties have paid double minimum price for land which has been found not to be within the limits of a railroad land grant, the excess of $1.25 per acre shall in like manner be repaid to the purchaser thereof, or to his heirs or assignees." In the case now under consideration, although the railroad grant has been forfeited to the United States, said road has been constructed, but the lands have never been restored to the minimum price, and the vacant lands formerly within the limits of the branch lines are only subject to entry at $2.50 per acre, except as is specifically provided in certain cases under said act.

This is a case of an erroneous exaction of $1.25 per acre on the part of the local land officers, but under the law this office could not afford the party any relief. The application is denied.

Very respectfully,

THOS. H. CARTER,
Commissioner.

REGISTER AND RECEIVER,
La Grande, Oregon.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand from the reading of the report that the beneficiaries of this bill paid to the receivers of the public lands $2.50 an acre for lands for which they were only required to pay $1.25 per acre?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. That is correct.

Mr. SAYERS. And the object of this bill is to refund the difference between the price they paid and the $1.25 an acre?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Which can not be done under the present law.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that to be the purpose of the bill.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. That is all there is in the bill and all that it seeks to do.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS of Oregon, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. KYLE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCNAGNY. I ask that Mr. CONN have leave of absence to-day, on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration——

Mr. BABCOCK. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is equivalent to an objection.

The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

The committees were called for reports, when the following reports were submitted, ordered to be printed, and referred as follows:

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI.

By Mr. BARTLETT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported with amendments a bill (H. R. 7498) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River from a point within the limits of the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, known as Eagle Point, to the opposite bank of said river, in the county of Grant and State of Wisconsin—to the House Calendar.

INTERRUPTION TO AND INTERFERENCE WITH COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

By Mr. GEARY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported a substitute for the House resolution of July 2, 1894, to investigate interruptions to and interferences with commerce among the several States—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The original resolution for which the substitute is presented will be laid upon the table.

RIGHT OF WAY, INDIAN TERRITORY.

By Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported with amendments a bill (H. R. 6122) authorizing the Kansas City, Oklahoma and Pacific Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CONVICT LABOR.

By Mr. RYAN, from the Committee on Labor, reported with amendments a bill (H. R. 6840) to protect free labor and industries in which it is employed from the injurious effect of convict labor by confining the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CLAIM OF MINNESOTA.

By Mr. KIEFER, from the Committee on Claims, reported with amendments, a bill (H. R. 5261) to reimburse the State of Minnesota—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORT UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I submit at this time a report from the Committee on Printing, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 23,000 copies of the tenth report of the United States Civil Service Commission be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 20,000 for distribution by the United States Civil Service Commission.

The report (by Mr. BRODERICK) was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the House concurrent resolution to print 23,000 copies of the tenth annual report of the United States Civil Service Commission, and direct me to report the same with recommendation that it do pass.

The estimated cost of same is $5,000.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour for the consideration of morning business begins at thirty-one minutes past 12. The call rests with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AGREEMENT WITH THE YUMA INDIANS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, on day before yesterday, in the morning hour, the bill S. 1919 was under consideration, and was partly read. I ask that that bill be taken up at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1919) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Yuma Indians in California, for the cession of their surplus lands, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that this bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HUNTER] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. I think it would be better to consider it in Committee of the Whole. It will take but a moment longer.

Mr. HUNTER. On day before yesterday an order was made for the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and I suppose that order will stand.

Mr. BURROWS. If that order was made, for the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, of course that order will stand.

Mr. HUNTER. That is the fact, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman to say that consent was given to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair finds upon examination that consent has been given to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House amendments to the Senate bill may be read.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs were read.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, now I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that general debate has not yet been closed upon this bill. Does the gentleman ask to close general debate?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes. I do not desire to debate the bill at all. It is unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HUNTER] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the bill by sections.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Sisters of St. Joseph are hereby granted the tract of land provided for in article 7 of the agreement, including the buildings thereon, and the land to be set aside for a school farm, the whole not to exceed one half section, or 320 acres, so long as they shall use the same for religious, educational, and hospital purposes for said Yuma Indians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the language just read, and insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to dispose, within a reasonable time, of the tract of land provided for in article 7 of the agreement, including the buildings thereon, being the tract of land known as Fort Yuma, together with sufficient land lying to the eastward of said tract, to make one half section of land, or 320 acres, to be used as a school farm and for educational, religous, and hospital purposes for said Yuma Indians, upon such terms as to him shall seem best for the care, education, and training of said Indians."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to from time to time fix the rate of water rents to be paid by the said Indians, and that each male adult Indian of the Yuma tribe residing on the said reservation at the time of the approval of this act shall be granted during ten years, or his natural life, water for 1 acre of the land which shall be allotted to him, if he utilizes the same in growing crops, free of all rent charges.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommended the following amendments:

In section 7 strike out from the word "tribe," in line 4, to the word "shall," in line 5, and from the word "granted," in line 5, to the word "water," in line 6, and add at the end of the section, "during the period of ten years, to be computed from the date when said irrigation company begins the delivery of water on said reservation;" so that the section as amended shall read:

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to, from time to time, fix the rate of water rents to be paid by the said Indians, and that each male adult Indian of the Yuma tribe shall be granted water for 1 acre of the land which shall be allotted to him, if he utilizes the same in growing crops, free of all rent charges during the period of ten years, to be computed from the date when said irrigation company begins the delivery of water on said reservation."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill, as amended, be ordered to a third reading.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That any Indians of the United States to whom land has been allotted shall be authorized to lease their lands for a period not exceeding five years, when deemed to their interest by the Secretary of the Interior, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary shall prescribe."

Mr. HUNTER. I make the point of order that this is not germane to this bill, and it is certainly a change of existing law.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will not urge the point of order, although I do not think it is well taken. This bill disposes of Indian lands on a reservation, and this amendment is a general provision concerning Indians. I ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order, to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. HUNTER. I will do that.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, this amendment provides that where lands have been allotted to Indians in severalty, if it is deemed to their best interest by the Secretary of the Interior, they may be permitted to lease their lands for a term not exceeding five years, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. The demand comes from the following facts: In my State and in other portions of the country where lands have been allotted to these Indians many of them have not even proper teams with which to break up their lands. They have pony teams, but can not break up their lands and can not use them.

Now, they desire to lease them to the whites for a period not exceeding five years, if it shall be deemed by the Secretary of the Interior to their best interest so to do, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. I have had quite a large number of applications lately to have such a provision as this made, to ask that the Secretary of the Interior be allowed to permit Indians who may have had allotments made to them to lease their lands for five years. It will result in their lands being improved where they would not otherwise be, and would cause a large amount of land to be broken up and put into cultivation that would not otherwise be.

No harm can come to the Indians, because this is to be done under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior; and, furthermore, it will not be permitted, as it is under his supervision, where he thinks it would not be to the interest of the Indians. He must first determine that it is to their interest, and then the leases will be made at such rates and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. It will be to the advantage of the Indians. Dealing with the Indians after they have had their lands allotted to them in severalty is one of the most serious questions that is now presented to us; to determine how they shall get along. This will enable them to have their lands broken up, and must inure to their benefit.

Mr. CANNON of California. Why not specify in your amendment for what purpose they are leased, so as to compel the lessee to break the land up? He might lease it for any other purpose.

Mr. PICKLER. That will be a regulation for the Secretary of the Interior; and I think it had better be left to his discretion.

Mr. HUNTER. I think that after their allotments have been made to them the Secretary of the Interior could regulate that matter; but I will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. The Department has not that right.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall not insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. STOCKDALE (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be passed informally without losing its right on the call.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REVENUE CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. WISE (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill H. R. 6723, a bill to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Cutter Service.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to convene from time to time, as he may deem proper, a board to be composed of three surgeons of the Marine Hospital Service, of which the Surgeon-General thereof shall be chairman, to examine and report upon all officers of the Revenue Cutter Service who have become or may hereafter become incapacitated by reason of the infirmities of age or physical or mental disability not brought on by vicious habits of their own to efficiently perform the duties of their respective offices. And such officers as, under the terms of this act, may be reported by said board to be permanently incapacitated shall be placed on waiting orders out of the line of promotion, and the vacancies thereby created in the active list of officers shall be filled by promotion in the order of seniority, as now provided by law: Provided, however, That no such promotion shall be made until the professional qualifications of the candidates shall have been determined by written examinations before a board of officers of the Revenue Cutter Service convened by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose: Provided, further, That the number of officers upon the active list now authorized by law shall not be increased by this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary regulations, not inconsistent with law, to properly and impartially carry into effect the provisions of this act and for the general government of the Revenue Cutter Service.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts conflicting with the foregoing are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill just read is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SAYERS. Does not that bill have to be considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does, if that point is made.

Mr. SAYERS. I make the point.

Mr. WISE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The title of the bill was again reported.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, as the report upon this bill was made to the House by the gentleman from Florida, who is a member of the committee, I will yield my time to him, and he will explain the bill to the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have this bill read before we proceed.

Mr. WISE. I would state to the gentleman from Missouri that the gentleman from Florida will make a statement that will give all the information with respect to the bill. He will give a brief statement which will give the gentleman a thorough knowledge of the bill. It is strongly recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. TRACEY. Has the bill been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been read in the House.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill is, as its title states, to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Cutter Service. As is well known, the Revenue Cutter Service, although in many particulars similar, if not identical with the service of the Navy, is lacking in one quality possessed by the Navy, that of providing a means of retiring those officers who, by reason of disability, are unable to perform the duties of the offices to which they are assigned. In the Fifty-second Congress an effort was made to transfer the Revenue Cutter Service to the Navy in order to secure this desirable object. This bill proposes not to retire the officers of the Revenue Cutter Service, but to place them on waiting orders, practically what is done now.

In the report which is filed with this bill is a statement of the number of officers in the revenue service, their ages, the number of those on active duty and those not. There are in the service to-day thirty-six captains, of whom twenty-one are on board of vessels, three on special duty; two on special duty in the Life-Saving Service; ten on waiting orders. These ten on waiting orders are officers who by reason of their age or physical infirmity, brought on by their exposure in the line of duty, are unable to perform the duties of officers.

Now, it has been contended that the Revenue Cutter Service, being under the domain of the Treasury Department and subject to its orders, is a civil institution or organization and that anything which looks to providing for retirement of these officers would practically be a precedent which should always be avoided, viz, the providing of a retired or pension list for civil employés of the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, the argument strikes me and struck the committee as not being valid. It is a fact that the revenue service is under the orders of the Treasury Department and the Secretary of the Treasury; but that is not because of any essential necessity that it should be; it arises from the fact that the duties of the officers in this service relate to the protection of the revenue of the country, relate to the patroling of the coasts, and that it is more convenient that they should be under that Department of the Government which has control of the question of revenue than under any Department which has nothing in common with the sphere or functions of the Treasury Department.

When we come to look at the duties imposed upon the Revenue Cutter Service, it will be found that they are analagous in every respect to the duties imposed on the Navy. You will find that the organization is in every respect similar; and a close investigation will reveal the fact that the officers and men of this service are probably exposed to more inconvenience, hardships, and risk than are the officers and men of the Navy in time of peace.

In addition to these considerations, it is a fact that their whole organization is of a military rather than of a civil character. The officers are commissioned. They hold their commissions under the nomination and appointment of the President with the confirmation by the Senate. They are commissioned without limit as to time—for life. They are subject to military discipline; they have uniforms; they are at the command to go and to come at the will of the Department; they are required on active service to be aboard their ships and to move from place to place.

Their vessels are armed; their men are subject to regular discipline and drill, and from time to time in the history of this country they have occasionally been transferred from the dominion of the Treasury Department to that of the Navy Department, and they have taken part actively in every war that this country has had. Consequently, if you come to look at the design and purpose of this organization, you will find there is nothing in it of a civil character except the fact that it is under the control of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida a few questions if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. MALLORY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This bill, while on its face it provides that these men shall be placed on waiting orders, is really an indirect way of putting them on the retired list at full pay, is it not?

Mr. MALLORY. Well, I suppose it would amount to that. I do not think, however, it is an indirect way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, these are civil officers, are they not?

Mr. MALLORY. I deny that. They are not civil officers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do you make it out that they are anything else?

Mr. MALLORY. They have every element of military officers that is possessed by officers of the Army and Navy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How are they paid now?

Mr. MALLORY. I have not before me a statement of their pay, but the gentleman can find it in the Revised Statutes. I think captains receive $2,000, first lieutenants about $1,800, and second lieutenants about $1,500.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They receive the same pay as officers of similar rank in the Navy, do they not?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; I think about that.

Mr. HULL. That is a mistake. A captain in the Navy receives over $3,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And while this bill says that the number of officers on the active list shall not be increased, there is no limit in the bill to the number that can be put on waiting orders, as you term it; is there?

Mr. MALLORY. There is no limit in that respect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are these officers subject to court-martial?

Mr. MALLORY. They are.

I am informed by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] that I was in error in stating that the pay of the officers of the Revenue Marine Service is identical with that of corresponding officers of the Navy. So far as captains are concerned, I am satisfied that the pay is not identical. Captains of the Navy, if there are any, rank much higher.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that if this bill passes it will be a mere entering wedge or initiatory step to placing every class of officers in the civil employ of the Government on waiting orders, or on the retired list?

Mr. MALLORY. No; I do not, for this reason: This is not a civil organization. If the gentleman will undertake to examine the matter, he will find that in this revenue-cutter service there is every element of a military organization that there is in the Army and Navy. And I have no hesitancy in saying that if the efficiency of the Army and the Navy of the United States is promoted by the maintenance of a retired list, this legislation will also add to the efficiency of this service in an equal degree.

You will find on an investigation that there are to-day in this service and drawing pay on waiting orders, officers who are utterly incapacitated for the service, one who is over 90 years of age; another, who I understand is about 90, and several others ranging in years from 70 to 90. Now, they can not be removed; you can do nothing with them, and you have the way blocked by which the efficient and younger men who are coming up into the service can be prompted and assume in reality the duties that they are now often compelled to do in the place of those older officers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Could they not be legislated out of office?

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, yes; they could be, undoubtedly, and so you could legislate out of office the superannuated officers of the Army and Navy. But I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the Government of the United States does not propose to treat men whose lives have been exposed in this service, men who entered this service with a promise that they should be appointed for life, and who are exposed to danger and hardship more than any other men in the service—I say I assume that the Government of the United States does not propose to treat these men in that manner.

Let me say to the gentleman that in all the service of the United States, there are no men connected with its affairs, who perform more arduous and dangerous duties than do the men connected with this service. The ships on which they are employed are small, and it is necessary that they should be small and of light draught, because it is important that they shall be able to go into the shoals, bays, and harbors, all along the coast. They are uncomfortable, and are obliged to be near the coast all the time. They rarely get out more than 200 miles from the shore, and they are exposed to all the storms and tempests, especially those which prevail on our Southern coasts, and the Gulf coast in the fall of the year, in September and October, every two or three weeks.

In addition to that they are liable to be called upon at any moment to engage in hostilities with any parties who are opposing the execution of the laws of our Government which these men are employed to enforce. They are required to bring a vessel to and, if necessary, to fire upon her if she does not stop on proper signals; and, as I have already said, if the gentleman will read the report, he will find that hundreds of these officers have from time to time, during the wars in which this Government has been engaged, ever since the Revolutionary war, been transferred to the Navy, and have done as good and efficient service in their respective spheres as any other officers, whether in the Army or Navy.

Mr. EVERETT. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest in that connection that they really constitute a part of the armed forces of the country for the maintenance of law?

Mr. MALLORY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. EVERETT. And they should be upon the same general footing that the Army and the Navy of the United States are placed in regard to the laws affecting retirements and promotions.

Mr. MALLORY. I think there is no question of that.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is there not a marine force on every one of the war ships?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; but this Revenue Cutter Service has no connection with the marine service.

What I am trying to convey, however, to the gentleman from Missouri in response to his inquiry is the assurance that these men are not by any means civil employés of the Government, but are of a military character. I have already shown that they have official rank. There are captains and lieutenants amongst them; there are chief engineers and assistant engineers, just as we have in the organization of the Navy proper. They are subject to military discipline of the strictest kind, and more than that, they are drilled both with the small arms and with the big guns in the strictest possible manner. They have rank, while perhaps not the same exactly as in the Navy—because I do not remember if we have captains now, although we used to have them in the Navy—but they have a similar rank to that borne by the officers in the Navy.

The gentleman from Missouri seems to assume that they are civilians and that there should not be in regard to them a distinction made between them and other civil employés of the Government. In addition to what I have said in that connection, I wish to add that they are on this dangerous service all the time. Other civil employés of the Government have their leaves of absence, but the leaves of absence of the officers of this service are few and far between, because necessarily the older men can not be retired, are unable to perform the duties, and all the work practically falls upon the younger men.

Civil employés of the Government have certain hours of work. Take for instance in the Departments here at Washington. After the day's work is done they can go home; they can devote themselves to other pursuits; they can improve their minds or their fortunes if they have the ability to do so, but the revenue-cutter service does not permit these officers of whom I am speaking to do anything of that sort, or in fact to do anything else than perform the work which is assigned to them. They are obliged to be on their posts all the time. They are obliged to keep up two establishments if they have families; and if their family is living along the coast somewhere they are sometimes obliged to be five hundred, a thousand, or may be five thousand miles away for a year or two at a time.

There is no similarity, therefore, in the position of the civil employés of the Government and the work that these men are engaged in, and I challenge any gentleman to produce any argument that will give a scintilla of reason to assume that they are similar, in any respect, other than the mere fact that they are under the control of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LOUD. Is it not a fact also that the naval cadets are now substantially graduated into this service?

Mr. MALLORY. Many of them are, undoubtedly.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Florida think that these men pursue a more dangerous avocation than those engaged in the merchant marine?

Mr. MALLORY. I do.

Mr. MILLIKEN. They certainly do.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know how it is on the New England coast, but in my part of the country, on the Gulf coast, where harbors are few and far between—because between Key West and Pensacola, a distance of about 1,200 miles of seacoast, there are only four or five good harbors—they certainly have a more dangerous employment.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Would not anybody engaged in the service of the merchant marine as a rule, nine out of ton of them, jump at a chance to get into this service?

Mr. MALLORY. I think not. If I were the captain of a 1,000-ton American ship, I would rather be employed in that service than to occupy the post of a captain in the Revenue Cutter Service.

Mr. MILLIKEN. You could make a good deal more money.

Mr. PIGOTT. And there would be less danger.

Mr. MALLORY. There is certainly less danger and less hardship.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman says this is a dangerous service. I should like to inquire if any of these officers have been killed in active service within the last four or five years?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know whether they have been killed in active service, but their health is very much impaired by the exposure to which they are subjected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not considered that life on salt water is the healthiest life in the world?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know that it is. I know that nobody ever saw a bald-headed sailor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do not all the city people go to the ocean as a means of recuperating their health?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me right there, for a moment——

Mr. MALLORY. I have here a list of the pay which is received. The captains are receiving $2,500 per annum; first lieutenants, $1,800; second lieutenants, $1,500; third lieutenants, $1,200; chief engineers, $1,800; first assistants, $1,500; second assistants, $1,000. On waiting orders the captains receive $1,800; first lieutenants, $1,500; second lieutenants, $1,200; third lieutenants, $900: chief engineers, $1,500; first assistant engineers, $1,200; second assistant engineers, $900.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In addition to these salaries they receive rations, and all their expenses are paid, are they not?

Mr. MALLORY. I think they receive one ration. I am not sure about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are at no expense whatever when they are in the service, are they?

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, undoubtedly; they are at the same expense that the officers of the Army and Navy are.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But what expense are they put to?

Mr. MALLORY. They must have clothing, and other things besides the mere ration which is necessary for them to live on.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are those other expenses?

Mr. MALLORY. I am mentioning them. I do not see exactly the point of the gentleman's question. If the gentleman is opposed to the bill, I fail to see it from his questions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I am.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman will not be. I call attention to the fact that I have already stated that there is now in the service on waiting orders one man 91 years of age, another 90, another about 77, another about 73, another about 72, another of 69, another of 68, and so on.

Mr CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Florida if he does not think that the extreme age of these men is proof positive that this is not a very dangerous or hazardous service?

Mr. MALLORY. Not at all. There are others on the retired list besides these elderly gentlemen; men who have lost their health by reason of the exposure to which they have been subjected. Now, I will say further that this bill has been recommended for a number of years by the Treasury Department. In 1872 Secretary Boutwell recommended it, or a similar measure. Secretaries Richardson and Folger afterward recommended it. Mr. Carlisle recommends it at the present time, and thinks it is essential and necessary. I can say with every conviction of truth that those men who understand the situation, who appreciate the drawbacks and the clogs upon the efficiency of the service and the inability of the service to get rid of its members who are disqualified by disability, believe that the difficulty can not be gotten over in any other way than by providing for the elevation of the energetic and capable men in the service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This bill restricts this "waiting" order business to the officers in the service, does it not?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you are going into it as a matter of justice, why not put the privates on waiting orders as well as the officers?

Mr. MALLORY. Possibly I would be willing to do that, but I doubt very much whether the gentleman from Missouri would.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am opposed to the whole thing.

Mr. MALLORY. There is this distinction between the two. The enlisted men are enlisted only for a limited term of years, and on the expiration of that term they can quit the service and pursue some other occupation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think it would be a more sensible plan to have these officers serve for short terms, so they could retire and go back into the body of the people, as well as these privates, instead of undertaking to give them a life tenure and retirement with pay?

Mr. MALLORY. Does the gentleman think it is better that the officers of the Army and Navy should have short terms and be retired among the people. I think the principle is the same in both cases.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it would be a good deal better to have them bounced when they get to be about 60 years of age.

Mr. MALLORY. Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill simply provides for the retirement, the placing on waiting orders, of those who are found by physical examination to be disqualified and incapable of performing their duties, and giving them the same pay as they are now receiving when they are retired on waiting orders. If it is a thing that commends itself to the judgment of the House, and I think it is a thing that should commend itself to the judgment of every man, as it does to those who live along the seacoast who have opportunity to observe the work of this service—if it commends itself to the judgment of the House, it certainly ought to pass without further delay; and I will therefore not consume further time. I reserve the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SAYERS having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 6108) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895;

A bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 5894) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5601) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the South, or Main, Canadian River, at or near the town of Noble, in Oklahoma Territory.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 6558) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. STEWART, Mr. BATE, and Mr. PALMER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 120) for the relief of H. W. Shipley; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4671) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Joseph G. Utter.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 133) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Joseph G. Utter.

EFFICIENCY OF THE REVENUE CUTTER SERVICE.

The Committee again resumed its session, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the American people are not ready and are not willing to begin the establishment of a system of pensions from the civil walks of life in this country. I am opposed to the whole business. With all due respect and regard for what the gentleman from Florida has said, these men are simply in the civil service. They have life positions and draw good pay.

I undertake to make this proposition without fear of successful contradiction: that if you will bounce all these officers out of the revenue service this moment you can find twenty competent men before sundown to take every place so vacated, and they will be glad to get them. Such fat jobs are not going begging, sure as you live. If it could be telegraphed to every post-office in the United States this morning that these places were vacant, every member of this House would have from one to fifty applications before sundown from men who desire to fill these places, and who are thoroughly competent.

Now, I want to make this general observation. The whole tendency of things here is to increase the retired list of the Army, to increase the retired list of the Navy, to pension and put on the retired list every man that has had any service in connection with the Army or Navy, however safe that service may have been. It is all wrong and opposed to the genius of our institutions. I am opposed to the whole thing. People are anxious to secure these places and they ought to be satisfied with what they get. Before the Pension Committee of this House there has been pending ever since it was organized a proposition to pension the clerks of paymasters during the Mexican war. They were just as safe during that struggle as a man who stayed at home; and yet they gravely urge their so-called claims in season and out of season; and certainly they have as substantial basis for their demand as have the officers provided for by this bill. There is a proposition that bobs up here every time an opportunity presents itself to pension the mail carriers of the country and the clerks in the Railway Mail Service.

In fact, everybody that has anything to do with the Government appears to think in the first place that he ought to have a life tenure, and in the second place, when he gets to be about 60 or 62 years of age, he thinks he ought to be billeted on the people at a good salary the remainder of his life. The whole scheme is un-American and an outrage on the taxpayers of the country.

It is alleged both in the report on this bill and in the speech of my friend from Florida that this Revenue Cutter Service is particularly hazardous. Let us see what the truth is. There is not a man in it that ever got a thousand miles from shore. They are always within reach of land. True, they spend most of their time on the ocean.

It is admitted, or all science is a lie, that life upon salt water is the healthiest life possible. In fact, it is recommended for invalids. As to the peril, not a man in this service has been killed or seriously wounded for years. These men in the Revenue Cutter Service do not jeopardize their lives, or their limbs, or their health half as much as the men who work in mines, or in rolling mills, or as an engineer on a railroad train.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. MALLORY. Does not the gentleman know that the revenue act of July 1, 1799, authorizes the President "to cause the revenue cutters to be employed to defend the seacoast and to repel hostility to vessels and commerce within their jurisdiction?" I ask the gentleman if there is any other civil service so employed?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true as to every able-bodied citizen of this country. Any of us are liable to be ordered into service by the authorities at any time in defense of the Republic. I want to recur to the proposition that I was starting to make when interrupted, about the service in this revenue-cutter business. It is not as hazardous as being an engineer on a railroad train; it is not as hazardous as being a conductor on a railroad train; it is not as hazardous as being a fireman on a railroad train; it is not as hazardous as hitching up a pair of mules on a Western prairie and driving them to a reaper or mower. [Laughter.] There are more casualties on the farms and in the factories of the land. It is no more hazardous than ordinary steamboating. It is not as dangerous as service in the merchant marine.

Now, one thing further, Mr. Chairman. If the people of this revenue service are entitled to be put on the retired list by reason of the extra risks they run, I want to make the gentleman from Florida and everybody else an additional suggestion about the danger of different kinds of service. The most dangerous service that an American citizen can be engaged in in a time of peace, not even barring the Army or Navy, is the business of being a United States marshal or deputy United Stares marshal, especially down in the districts where they make moonshine whisky.

Mr. COX. What do you think about a Congressman's life?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why a Congressman's life is in some danger in that kind of a district.

Mr. SAYERS. Unless he joins in with them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Unless he stands in with them.

This bill is the beginning of an indefensible system. It is the thin edge of the entering wedge. It means a list of pensioners from the civil service which will be larger than the pension list by reason of service in the Army and Navy. No man can compute the cost thereof. The burdens of the people are heavy enough in all conscience sake now. They are most assuredly not in a frame of mind to see them increased. They will not have it.

I submit in perfect good faith that if you are going to pension these officers, because that is what putting them on the retired list means, where are you going to draw the line? Where will you stop?

What better right have these officers to this favor than thousands of others? What man in this House can vote for this bill and then refuse to vote for a bill when the marshals and their deputies come in here and ask that they be put upon the retired list of the Army or that they be pensioned because they happened to get a bullet in them somewhere in a strike or a riot, or in hunting up an illicit still down in the mountains of Tennessee, or North Carolina, or Georgia, or some parts of Missouri. [Laughter.] They will come as sure as fate if you pass this bill, and a host which no man can number will come after them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time until to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has expired.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6723, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriations for payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, was taken up, the amendments of the Senate nonconcurred in; and a conference with the Senate requested on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois, and Mr. BINGHAM as conferees on the part of the House.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 6108) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, was taken up, the amendments of the Senate nonconcurred in, and a conference with the Senate requested on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi, and Mr. HITT as conferees on the part of the House.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 5894) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, was taken up, the amendments of the Senate nonconcurred in and a conference with the Senate requested on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, Mr. OUTHWAITE, and Mr. BOWERS of California as conferees on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special rule adopted by the House the remainder of this day is assigned to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Chair recognizes the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY].

ACCEPTANCE OF A PAINTING.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I call up the bill (H. R. 4734) to authorize the Secretary of State to accept for the United States of America a painting by G. F. Watts, Royal Academician, entitled "Love and Life."

The bill was read as follows:

Whereas G. F. Watts, Royal Academician of London, England, has signified, through the Secretary of State, a desire to present to the people of the United States the painting by himself entitled "Love and Life," which painting was on exhibition under the auspices of the royal British commissioner at the World's Columbian Exposition: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, instructed to accept the said painting with a suitable acknowledgment of thanks to the said G. F. Watts, Royal Academician, and that all the duties due and payable to the United States on the said painting imported from London be, and the same are hereby, remitted.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes the Secretary of State to accept on behalf of the United States a painting by G. F. Watts, of the Royal Academy of London, entitled "Love and Life." Mr Watts exhibited this painting under the auspices of the royal British commissioner, at the International Exposition held at Chicago. It is hardly necessary for me to say that Mr. Watts is one of the most distinguished artists in England.

As far back as 1837 he was exhibiting his paintings in the Royal Academy, and among his best portraits are those of Tennyson, Gladstone, Duke of Argyle, and John Stuart Mill. His list of ideal and mythological works is lengthy and his paintings are found in several of the famous galleries of Europe. The Secretary of State, in a communication, has indicated that Mr. Watts desires to present this painting to the United States, and this bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SECURITIES OF JOHN S. BRADFORD.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I call up the bill (H. R. 4209) for the relief of the securities of John S. Bradford.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John Cassels and Rosalie M. Bradford, securities of John S. Bradford, deceased, United States consul at Antigua, West Indies, from August 19, 1890, to August 6, 1891, be, and they are, released from the payment of $239.03, amount claimed to be due the United States on the official bond of John S. Bradford, and said liability is canceled and his accounts with the Government are deemed adjusted and settled.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, John S. Bradford, for the benefit of whose securities this bill has been introduced, was appointed a consul at Antigua, West Indies, August 19, 1890. His health was very bad from the commencement of his service as consul. On the 6th of August, 1891, after a severe illness of three months he died, without having served as long as one year. During the time that he held the office nothing that he received was paid to his family. His wife, Rosalie M. Bradford, assisted in his outfit, spending for that purpose nearly $200.

After his death, on a final adjustment of his accounts, his entire salary, then due, and allowances for stationery, etc., were retained by the Treasury Department to pay what seemed to be a deficit in his accounts, and he was found indebted to the Government in the additional sum of $239.06, for which his sureties are held liable. The committee think, in view of the fact that no part of his salary had been received by his wife, and as she had furnished the money for his equipment and outfit, that it would be a very great hardship upon her to permit the collection of this amount due on the official bond, as she was not the recipient of any part of his salary, as he served only a few months, and the unpaid salary and allowance for stationery were withheld.

It was believed by the committee, under the circumstances, that it would be an injustice and a hardship to require his securities to pay the small amount remaining, and the passage of the bill is recommended unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Did he overdraw his account, or how did this deficit occur?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. He was ill soon after his arrival at Antigua, West Indies, a very unhealthy place; he did not, however, overdraw the account. Being sick for three months, and the business of the office not having been managed by him, it was found after his death that there was not a proper amount of money on hand.

All of the salary due him at the time of his death was held by the Treasury to cover the deficit, and the amount of stationery to which he was entitled was also withheld; and these amounts reduced the aggregate to $239.06, which is the balance claimed by the Government. If Capt. Bradford had not been ill there would have been no deficit in his accounts. Up to the time of his severe illness the financial affairs of the consulate were well managed, and every dollar due the Government paid promptly. He was an honorable, accomplished gentleman, and he had the confidence and respect of all who knew him.

Mr. TATE. How is the widow held liable for any part of this obligation?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. She is on the bond.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Is the gentleman able to state who managed the office during his sickness and brought it into debt?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. At Antigua the salary paid the consul is not large, and there was no vice-consul to take charge of the business while Capt. Bradford was sick.

Mr. WASHINGTON. How, then, did this deficit occur? Did not the fees pass into the hands of somebody?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. On settlement it was found that there were certain fees due to the Government which were not in the office. As he was many miles away we do not know who had charge of the office during the entire time of his illness.

Mr. WASHINGTON. But who received the fees at the time that the consul was sick and not in the office?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Is it one of the things that you could not find out?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It is. When he died and his effects were taken charge of it was found that both his unpaid salary and the stationery allowance had been withheld by the Treasury Department to meet the deficit, and left the amount named in the bill unpaid.

Mr. WASHINGTON. How much did the Treasury hold back of the unpaid salary and the stationery allowance?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I think about $200.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Making somewhere between $400 and $500 of a deficit?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I can not give the exact amount, but substantially that.

Mr. WASHINGTON. It does not seem to me to be a good bill.

Mr. HUTCHESON. The gentleman from Kentucky, I understand, claims that the widow is liable on the bond?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes; she has a separate estate, and is joined in the bond with Mr. Cassels.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Then the claim is that she is liable as surety?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes; the bill relates only to the sureties on the bond. Of course, if the amount has to be paid she will have to pay it.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Well, she is not liable in law for it.

Mr. BRETZ. What is the matter with the other surety; why can not the amount be made from him?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The committee thought under the circumstances that when all the pay due Capt. Bradford by the Government was taken to adjust his account, and Mrs. Bradford, the only member of the family who had money, had furnished the outfit, that she ought to be released from liability.

Mr. BRETZ. But that ought not to release the other bondsman.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The Committee on Foreign Affairs reported the bill unanimously, and I ask for a vote upon it.

The question was taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and upon a division, demanded by Mr. BRETZ, there were—ayes 106, noes 8.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

On a division, demanded by Mr. BRETZ, there were—ayes 100, noes 8.

Mr. BRETZ. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. DOCKERY]. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. BRETZ and Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky were appointed tellers.

The House again divided.

Before the report by tellers was completed,

Mr. BRETZ. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So, no further count being demanded, the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REWRITING CONSULAR REGULATIONS.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1573) making an appropriation for rewriting the Consular Regulations.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be available immediately, for the purpose of rewriting the Consular Regulations under the supervision of the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. This bill appropriates money; but I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this bill has already passed the Senate and makes an appropriation of $2,000 for the purpose of rewriting the Consular Regulations under the supervision of the Secretary of State.

It has been customary to rewrite these regulations every few years. They were rewritten in 1881, and again in 1888. This is now 1894, and consequently they have not been rewritten for six years. During that time many changes have been made in the regulations; and I am informed by the Secretary of State, as well as by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the edition has been nearly exhausted, and in fact that we have a present need for the Consular Regulations to give to our consuls.

The changes made in the regulations since the publication of the edition of 1888 have affected the whole body of rules, so that the printed volume we now have can not be said to contain existing regulations; and I have a letter from the Secretary of State, and also one from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the necessity for rewriting these regulations.

The amount carried in this bill is only $2,000. The amount paid for rewriting the Consular Regulations in 1881 was $3,000, and the amount paid in 1888 was also $3,000. The Secretary of State now says that he can furnish the new edition, as provided in the bill, for $2,000. The bill, as I said before, has passed the Senate, and is recommended by the entire Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House.

Mr. BRETZ. Did we not appropriate a sum of money in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill for this particular purpose?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. We did not.

Mr. BRETZ. Was there not an amendment offered to that bill for this purpose?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. There was not.

Mr. HITT. It does not belong in the annual appropriation bill, because that is a bill providing for the expenses for the year, while this is not a periodical expenditure, except in the way the chairman of the committee has stated, occurring at intervals of from five to ten years.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If it is desired, I will have read the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State asking for this appropriation.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to know about this appropriation. If I understand the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], in 1888 there was a new edition of the Consular Regulations edited and published. Now, not quite six years after, we are to have another. The prior one, the gentleman says, was in 1881. This is a year sooner than the last time. Now, consular regulations are very necessary to have. In fact, from what I have observed in the changes of consular officers, and the conduct of some of them, I have felt that there was a sad need for regulations, or perhaps for a knowledge of them.

If there could be some appropriation made that would give consular officers a knowledge of the regulations, it seems to me it would be a good thing. For instance—and I want the attention of my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] now—I have in mind a consular officer who was appointed not a great while ago, who, after he had taken the burden of office, on his trip to his post of duty traveled over Europe, and judging from the letters that he wrote back home for publication in the papers, he must have had a wonderful experience.

He seemed to have gotten the American flag and the American eagle and unfurled one and pulled the tail feathers of the other, and just literally made him scream through London, and Paris, and Vienna, and Rome, and through the smaller cities of the effete monarchies on the other side, upholding the honor and dignity of his country and bidding defiance to the older civilizations.

Now, I have an idea that if that man had had a copy of the Consular Regulations, and had been compelled to read them, probably he would not have done this thing in the absence of a special commission like that which was given to our former friend and brother, Mr. Blount, when he was sent to Hawaii. I never have known, and it has been a matter of doubt in my mind, having this one instance in my mind, whether this gentleman had an extra commission other than that of a consul, or whether he, in the excess and overflow of patriotism, was merely upholding the honor and credit of the Government and bidding defiance to "all the world and the rest of mankind."

I only mention this to show the necessity of having these Consular Regulations; and then if we can get an appropriation to have somebody read the regulations to the consuls, it seems to me it would be well.

But now, to get down to the merits of this proposition, having said this much by way of introduction, to show the necessity of having the regulations, I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], who is in charge of the bill, and also my colleague [Mr. HITT], who was formerly in the State Department, if it is not true that the regulations as published in 1888 or 1889 have been modified, and if, wherever they have been modified, they are not in existence in black and white, reduced to writing and probably in print, and if this code of consular regulations with all the amendments is not in esse, and when you come to publish a new edition, will you not publish the regulations as amended? I will just wait for an answer and see if that is not the fact.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will have the letter of the Secretary of State read, if the gentleman desires to hear it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I suppose the Secretary of State, not having that exact question asked him, probably does not answer that exact question.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will say to my friend from Illinois that the edition is about exhausted, and it is necessary to have the Consular Regulations printed again, and so many changes have been made that it is deemed best to have the whole work rewritten. This bill has already passed the Senate.

The necessity for rewriting the Consular Regulations was apparent to the Secretary of State and to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It is not an appropriation to publish another edition of the Consular Regulations. I will vote for an appropriation to publish an edition large enough to give every consul half a dozen copies, and I would consider it money well expended. I would double lead it, so that they can read it easily.

This is not an appropriation for publishing a new edition, but it is an appropriation for editing a new edition of the Consular Regulations; and I will ask the question again: Is it not true that the Consular Regulations published in 1888, with every amendment that has been made from that time to this, is in black and white and in print now? I will pause again for an answer, if anybody knows. [A pause.] I do not seem to get it. I think my colleague from Illinois can answer that question.

Mr. HITT. I suppose the greater part of what will be in the forthcoming volume is, in one form or another, in print.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HITT. And some of the instructions may yet be in manuscript. I do not believe that all of it is in existence at all. I know something of the revision of the regulations made in 1881. It was simply a compilation of the changes that had occurred from cases arising where no instructions had been sent to consuls, and in editing the existing regulations it was necessary that they should be harmonized with the other parts of the work.

That was under the charge of a very skillful man, the chief of the bureau. It was in a certain sense editing, but it was more than that—it was writing; it was harmonizing; it was making efficient a very long and complex body of regulations to carry out and supplement a body of law; and he did it so clearly that a man newly appointed, in the fashion our consuls are, without any preparation, should not make a mistake. The necessity for having consuls read the regulations is undoubtedly pressing.

The case of the gentleman on his way to his post who indulged in so much comment on the ways of the kingdoms, the principalities, and the powers of the world he passed through was covered by the regulations, though he did not know it, which forbid him strictly from writing or publishing any comment upon any foreign government. The other case he mentioned, of the distinguished gentleman, formerly a member of this House, who went to Hawaii is exceptional, for he was not an ordinary officer, but paramount.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, now, when that edition was made in 1881, my friend was Assistant Secretary of State, as I understand it, and I have no doubt the work was admirably and thoroughly done by the aid of my colleague, who was in the service of the Department of State, and by the aid of the chief of the consular bureau. But that work is still in existence. What is the necessity, when that work was so thoroughly done, and again another edition was published in 1889—what is the necessity of going now and giving a bonus of $2,000 to somebody to edit another edition ready to publish in 1894? In my judgment, if I would go to guessing about it, without being able to state——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state it was deemed necessary in 1881 to expend $3,000 for the purpose of rewriting the consular regulations.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. And it was deemed necessary in 1888 to expend $3,000 for the purpose of rewriting the consular regulations.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. And now we only ask for $2,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask the gentleman a question here?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Secretary of State, as I understand, is asking for $2,000 for the purpose of publishing these regulations at this time.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. For editing.

Mr. HITT. For writing.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The Secretary of State proposes to have it done by an officer of the State Department, and only asks $2,000, which is one-third less than was paid in 1881 and 1888.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is the gentleman able to give us the exact items of that estimate?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will have the letter of the Secretary read.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will yield in a minute for that.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to have the items of the estimate.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would like to have the items of the estimate too, but while the gentleman is seeking them, I want to say that I suppose this $2,000 is a bonus that is to go to some official or officials now in the public service and is extra to their pay. I want to ask my colleague if that is not a fact?

Mr. HITT. I beg my colleague's pardon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is not this a bonus to go to some official or officials in the public service?

Mr. HITT. I can not believe anything of that kind touching the present Secretary of State and the present President of the United States. It is impossible.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Who is to get the money?

Mr. HITT. The men who do the work. I know who the men were that did the work in 1881. I can not tell who will do it now. In those days they did hard work.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Were they in the public service?

Mr. HITT. Some were. And the one who had charge of the work was in the public service; he was a zealous, enthusiastic officer; he was paid a fair salary, I think; not a large salary.

Mr. COOMBS. I think I can explain this matter.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. All right; I am simply trying to get at the facts.

Mr. COOMBS. This same question was presented to my mind when this appropriation was before the House heretofore. At that time I objected at first to the appropriation. Afterwards I made a thorough examination both in the State Department and the Treasury Department; and I became entirely satisfied that this money was to be employed in the payment of skilled talent other than that now in the Government employ.

I became satisfied that some one skilled in international law would be engaged to collate this matter, and put it in a more perfect form than now exists—putting not only the old regulations, but all the new regulations under their proper heads. After investigating the matter half a day, I made up my mind that the appropriation was a proper one, although I opposed it originally.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois: I will ask the gentleman who is to write these regulations.

Mr. COOMBS. I do not know the gentleman's name. It will be done by a gentleman versed in international law, but not by an officer of the State Department. The work lay between two or three persons when I heard of it last; but it is not to be done in the State Department. I supposed in the first instance it would be done there.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, I will yield enough time (as I believe I have the floor) to permit the gentleman in charge of this bill to give the items of this appropriation.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask my friend to complete his remarks. I desire then to have read letters from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury and from the Secretary of State, which will give proper information.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield the gentleman enough time to have that done.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to speak in my own time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. All right. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used about twenty-two minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. After a single remark I will yield the floor, reserving the remainder of my time.

I doubt if there be a necessity for this appropriation. For one hundred years the Department of State has been executing the law touching the foreign service. This code of regulations pertaining to the diplomatic service, as well as that pertaining to the consular service, is a growth—as much as the practice and the decisions of your courts are a growth.

Now, in my judgment the rewriting of these Consular Regulations is practically a matter of the use of scissors and paste, substantially all this work being now in black and white. The doing of this work will not be half as onerous as it would be to rewrite a Congressional Directory, because every year or two there is a change of officials.

Therefore I believe that the Secretary of State with his present officials, already under pay, will be able to do this work of editing without one cent of extra appropriation. They have very competent men in that Department. They have only a little over fifty employés in the office of the Secretary of State. Nearly all of those employés are high-class men.

Why, sir, that Department is as well officered as the Treasury Department. If you should take the high-priced officials out of it, there would not be much left. Those men are thoroughly competent, as they ought to be. I do not believe there is any necessity for this appropriation. I will agree to vote $2,000, or $5,000, or any other sum that may be necessary, for printing these regulations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury and the letter of the Secretary of State on this subject be read, and now send them to the Clerk.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 7, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Secretary of State of the 1st instant, inclosing copy of a proposed bill appropriating the sum of $2,000 to be expended by the Secretary of State in having the Consular Regulations rewritten, and requesting the passage of the same by Congress at an early date.

Respectfully, yours,

S WIKE, Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 1, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to request that you will transmit to Congress the inclosed form of a bill appropriating $2,000 to be expended by the Secretary of State in having the Consular Regulations rewritten, and with it the following statement showing why the appropriation is asked for:

1. The edition of 1888, now in use, is nearly exhausted. The changes made in the regulations since the publication of that edition have so far affected the whole body of rules that the printed volume can not be said to contain the existing Consular Regulations in substantial integrity. A reprint of the old text would therefore be inexpedient.

2. The plan and execution of the present edition are, in my judgment, defective, and I wish to have the book rewritten throughout in a manner that will render it more intelligible and easy of use, and more complete and accurate as a compendium of rules for the government of consuls.

The previous editions of 1881 and 1888 cost the Government $3,000 each (20 Stat. 274; 21 id., 239; 24 id., 117); but $2,000 will suffice for the work now proposed.

In order that the revision may be begun at an early date a special bill has been prepared in the hope that it will be passed without incurring the delay that would result from the inclusion of the appropriation in one of the regular appropriation bills.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

W. Q. GRESHAM.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am not at all familiar with this question, and I do not presume to put my judgment against that of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; but I wish to state in connection with this proposed appropriation that I believe it is sound policy and good business, whenever a committee reports a bill calling for an expenditure of the money of the people, that the report should be accompanied with an itemized statement showing the exact necessity for the appropriation.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman will yield a moment, I would like to answer his suggestion. When I called up this bill I had the Clerk read the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State, giving good reasons for the passage of the measure. I could have those letters embodied in the report; but without doing so I have complied with the rules of this House, and have furnished such a report as the rules require. I have given the House all the information that I could have embodied in a lengthy report. If the gentleman desires to make a point of order that there is no report, let him make it, and it will be overruled.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstands me. My request was for information which might show how the gentleman from Kentucky or his committee reached the conclusion that $2,000 is the necessary amount for this purpose. Of course, if these regulations ought to be printed the Government ought to provide a sufficient sum for that purpose.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Two officers of the Government—the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury—say that $2,000 is sufficient; and when they say that, as they have a special interest in this kind of work, as a matter of course I believe it is safe for the committee to adopt their recommendation as to cost.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have no doubt of that. Still I think it is good policy to know just where the money appropriated by the Congress is to go.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am sorry to see the gentleman from Missouri objecting to economy.

Mr. DOCKERY. No; I am not objecting to economy at all. But I think all of these amounts should be specific, and that we should know where and how the money appropriated is spent.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What would the gentleman from Kentucky say to an amendment requiring a report as to the expenditure of the money? Would the gentleman approve of that?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It has never been inserted in any bill passed heretofore, for the rewriting of the Consular Regulations. No such condition has ever been attached, and I am satisfied if the work is done under the supervision of the Secretary of State, as the bill provides, it will be done properly and well. The work will be done satisfactorily, and will be as well done as the work of either 1881 or 1888.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But is my friend satisfied with having things done as well as they have been done heretofore under the corrupt administration of the old parties? It ought to be an improvement. We have a "reform" Administration. Why, we have a Secretary of State who in some items has cut them down as high as three or four hundred dollars in the name of "economy;" some of them a little more than that?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This is cut down a thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And I beg to assure my friend that it is not doing himself or his committee justice, in view of past expressions here, to express a willingness in connection with this appropriation to have the work done merely "as well" as it has been done heretofore, and not better.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Let us have a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and, being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL GEODETIC ASSOCIATION.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I call up now, Mr. Speaker, for consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 126) authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the meeting of the International Geodetic Association.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the Government of the United States was invited in the year 1889 by the Imperial German Government to become a party to the International Geodetic Association; and

Whereas this Government duly accepted said invitation by a joint resolution of Congress approved February 5, 1889: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint delegates, who shall be officers of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, to attend the meetings of the said International Geodetic Association whenever and wheresoever the same shall be held; but no extra salary or additional compensation shall be paid to such officers by reason of such attendance.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], who will explain the purpose of this resolution.

Mr. DINSMORE. The sole purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the President to appoint the delegates to the International Geodetic Association. A joint resolution of Congress was passed February 5, 1889, authorizing the President to accept an invitation on behalf of the Government of the United States to become a member of the international association, and authorizing him to appoint a delegate for the next meeting of the association. In pursuance of that legislation the President appointed Prof. Davidson, and I believe he attended the first meeting, but there is no authority of law for the appointment of another delegate.

This resolution does not involve any other appropriation; and the only reason for its passage is to vest the President with the authority to appoint the delegates. There has not been any representative of the United States in this association since 1889. For several years it has been neglected, and this resolution has been reported solely for the purpose of authorizing him to make the appointment of the necessary delegate.

I suppose that is all that is necessary.

Mr. MORGAN. Does this provide for mileage and necessary expenses?

Mr. DINSMORE. No; nothing of the kind.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONSULAR OFFICERS.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6468) to amend section 1674 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to consular offices.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1674, subsections 2, 3, and 4, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows, respectively:

Second. "Deputy consul-general," "deputy consul," "deputy commercial agent," and "consular agent" shall be deemed to denote consular officers subordinate to such principals exercising the powers and performing the duties within the limits of their consulates-general, consulates, or commercial agencies, respectively, the first two at the same ports or places and the last at ports or places different from those at which such principals are located, respectively.

Third. "Vice-consul-general," "vice-consul," and vice-commercial agent" shall be deemed to denote consular officers who shall be substituted temporarily to fill the places of consuls-general, consuls, or commercial agents when they shall be temporarily absent or relieved from duty.

Fourth. Consular officers shall be deemed to include consuls-general, consuls, commercial agents, deputy consuls-general, deputy consuls, deputy commercial agents, vice-consuls-general, vice-consuls, vice-commercial agents, consular agents, and none others.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the the table.

VIRGINIUS INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I now call up for consideration bill H. R. 6111, for the disposal of the interest on the Virginius indemnity fund.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of State holds, "subject to such disposition as Congress may direct," an amount of money received by him as interest and premiums on the bonds in which the so-called Virginius indemnity was invested, as required by section 3659 of the Revised Statutes, pending the presentation, proof, and adjudication of the claims thereto; and

Whereas it appears that further interest has accrued, and is accruing, in respect of such money: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the said sum, being the earnings of a fund which was paid to the United States in trust for the purpose of relief of the families of those of the ship's company and of such of the passengers as were citizen of the United States who were executed, and to afford compensation to such of the ship's company and to such passengers as in like manner were citizens of the United States who were detained and suffered loss in Cuba, excluding from any participation therein all individuals indemnified as British subjects, is the property of the beneficiaries of said original fund, and the Secretary of State is hereby directed to distribute the same, together with all accretions thereof, accrued and which may accrue, among those persons who have already substantiated their right to participate in said fund, their heirs or legal representatives, under and by virtue of Executive orders heretofore issued and published.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the disposal of the accretions of the Virginius indemnity fund."

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read. It is full and explicit, and sets forth all the facts in connection with the matters referred to in the bill.

The report (by Mr. RAYNER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6111) "For the disposal of the interest on the Virginius indemnity fund," report the same back to the House with the following amendment:

Strike out, in the title of the bill, the words "interest on" and insert in lieu thereof the words "accretions of." As thus amended the committee recommends the passage of the bill.

in further report hereon the committee adopts and makes part hereof the accompanying report from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations:

[Senate Report No. 403, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1703) providing for the disposal of the accretions of the Virginius indemnity fund, beg leave to report as follows:

Under provisions of the treaty of February 11, 1871, with Spain to ascertain and settle the claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Spain for injuries suffered by them, a special agreement was made between Minister Cushing and the Spanish minister of foreign affairs, of date February 27, 1875, relative to the Virginius indemnity fund.

Under this agreement Spain paid into the hands of the President of the United States, in three installments, a gross sum of $80,000, to be distributed, under the order and direction of the President, among the several claimants, citizens of this country, for damages in the Virginius case on account of injuries done to such of her crew and passengers as were proven to be citizens of the United States.

The completed payment of this sum in gross was made by Spain of date July 1, 1875. A considerable time elapsed from the date of this payment until the several claims for damages by our citizens had been adjusted and settled in such manner as to make a distribution of the fund.

The money paid had been during this time placed at interest in United States bonds, and the expenditure and distribution of the amount of interest and premium accrued on this investment is the object of the pending bill.

The amount of this accretion, according to the latest report of it made by Secretary Bayard, February 10, 1887, was $24,635.19.

The Government of the United States, as such, suffered no loss and made no claim for any damages on account of the capture of the Virginius.

The special agreement with Spain was entered into only on behalf of private citizens of the United States, or their legal representatives, who had suffered damage by reason of such capture. The Virginius was what is styled in the correspondence a rebel or pirate steamer, condemned in the courts of Cuba as such, whose passengers and crew were some of them imprisoned, others executed as being aiders and abettors of the rebellion in Cuba, then being waged against the Spanish authority. Several of these passengers and of the crew were citizens of the United States, and thence the claims for damages arose.

The Spanish Government did not interfere in any manner with the adjudications of the Cuban courts, nor did it undertake to reimburse American citizens severally or particularly for wrongs claimed to have been done them by such adjudications, but it did agree to pay and did pay the sum abovementioned to enable the President of the United States to reimburse such of our citizens, the claimants, as he might determine were entitled to compensation for injuries suffered by them.

Your committee are of the opinion that the real owners of the fund are also the owners of the accretions thereof, unless there be something in the treaty or agreements of the parties to the transaction or in our own statutes making a different disposition of such accretions.

This fund has never been in the Treasury of the United States—the fund, with the accrued interest and premium thereon, remained in the custody of the Secretary of State, subject to the order of the President, and the accretions are subject to such disposition thereof as Congress may direct. The principal has been nearly all expended to claimants, but the interest and premiums accrued during the time in which the claims have been pending for proof and settlement is unexpended. There is no law directing the retention of this interest by the Government or by the President, and we therefore think that these accretions should follow the ordinary rule and be treated as a part of the principal. Neither the principal, nor the principal with its increment, will suffice to pay the full amount of the claims held to be valid and meritorious. A pro rata distribution among claimants is all that can be provided for.

It would be perhaps no violation of law or treaty or agreement that this Government should retain the accrued interest and premiums, and that we should direct them to be covered into the Treasury. Nevertheless we believe that it would be inequitable and unjust toward our own citizens that such a course should be taken. Such action would be equivalent to that of allowing a mere naked trustee to make some kind of profit or advantage out of the discharge of the duties of his trust.

It is true that a trustee may reimburse himself out of the fund for expenses of the trust. But in this case the expenses have been borne for the most part by the claimants themselves. They prepared and filed their claims and proofs in each instance. The only labor performed by our Government, or in behalf of the President, has been that of officials in the State Department, who have examined and passed upon the claims so presented. As all this has been done by officials already salaried for the performance of this and similar duties, it does not appear to us equitable that, as against its own citizens, the claimants, this Government should in any way or in any behalf recoup any part of the fund upon account of such service.

Your committee, therefore, favor the passage of the bill, with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "interest" in the title thereof and insert the word "accretions," as the increment of the fund arises from both interest and premium upon the bonds of the United States in which the principal was originally invested.

With this amendment your committee are of opinion that the bill should pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended as recommended by the committee.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN E. JOHNSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5525) authorizing John E. Johnson and others to accept medals of honor and diplomas from the Government of Spain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John E. Johnson, superintendent of the life-saving station at Hog Island, Virginia, and J. A. Doughty, J. K. Carpenter, William B. Goffigon, J. H. De Wald, C. F. Carpenter, J. E. Smith, J. R. Dunton, and R. C. Joynes, members of the life-saving crew at that station, be, and they are hereby, authorized to accept medals of honor and diplomas awarded them by the Government of Spain in recognition of their gallant rescue of the crew of the Spanish steamship San Albano, wrecked in the vicinity of Cape Charles on the 21st day of February, 1892.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs recommended the following amendments:

In line 3 strike out the word "superintendent" and insert in lieu thereof the word "keeper," and in line 12 strike out the word "first" and insert in lieu thereof the word "second."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REAR-ADMIRAL JOHN G. WALKER ET AL.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up bill (H. R. 6424) to authorize Rear-Admiral John G. Walker and Surg. Gen. J. Rufus Tryon, of the United States Navy, to accept the decorations of the "Busto del Libertador" of the third class from the President of Venezuela.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That Rear-Admiral John G. Walker and Surg. Gen. J. Rufus Tryon, of the United States Navy, be, and they are hereby, authorized to accept from the President of Venezuela the decoration of the "Busto del Libertador" in acknowledgment of the care and attention shown to the wounded officers and men of both political parties in the vicinity of La Guayra, Venezuela, during the revolution of 1892.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I shall be glad to know if this gentleman is still President of Venezuela—Busto del Libertador?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Those words mean "the bust of the liberator." I suppose the bust of Bolivar is referred to. The care and attention mentioned in the bill was shown during the last revolution in Venezuela, in 1892, to wounded officers and men, by Admiral Walker and Surg. Gen. Tryon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is he still President? It seems the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs does not know. I simply wanted to find out how useful this testimonial would be to Rear-Admiral Walker and Surg. Gen. J. Rufus Tryon. Is there much value in the testimonial, or is it merely an honorary matter?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will have read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy when the gentleman gets through, or if he will yield to me.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I should be very glad. I am asking for information in good faith.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the letter.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, October 23, 1893.

SIR: The President of Venezuela has conferred upon Rear-Admiral John G. Walker, United States Navy, and Surg. Gen. J. Rufus Tryon, United States Navy, the decoration of the "Busto del Libertador," in acknowledgment of the care and attention shown to the wounded officers and men of both political parties in the vicinity of La Guayra, Venezuela, during the revolution of last year.

The United States squadron there present was commanded by Admiral Walker, and Medical Inspector Tryon was the senior medical officer. Both exerted themselves to the utmost in the interest of humanity, and rendered very important service during several weeks in saving life and diminishing the sufferings of the wounded and dying.

Under these circumstances, I am of the opinion that these officers should be permitted to accept the compliment tendered them by the Venezuelan Government, and have to request that the Department of State take the proper steps to obtain the necessary permission from Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. A. BERBERT,
Secretary of the Navy.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, my impression is that that is not the name of any official of Venezuela, but the name of the decoration, just as the cross of the Legion of Honor is the name of a decoration. I think this decoration is a medal, containing the bust of Bolivar, the original liberator of the Colombian Republic.

I admit that it would be pretty difficult to ascertain who was the President of the Venezuelan Republic at any given time; but in this case I believe the medal is historical, and does not exhibit the bust of any present official.

Mr. REED. These services on the part of these officers occurred in the very last revolution, as I understand from the communication of the Secretary?

Mr. EVERETT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. As we are writing history now, and as this is a matter that refers to the rear-admiral and to the surgeon-general, and as it is a transaction in which the Republic of Venezuela is interested, and as we have the explanation now that it is a decoration which has stamped upon it the bust of Bolivar——

Mr. EVERETT. That is my understanding. I do not wish to speak too positively.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I should be glad to have a further contribution, if anybody can give it, as to the material substance of this decoration. Is it a ribbon, or is it a gold or silver medal?

Mr. EVERETT. That I can not tell you.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Probably it must be all right, because nobody seems to know anything about it. I do not. I am only asking for information.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROF. ASAPH HALL.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I call up the bill (S. 1860) to authorize Prof. Asaph Hall, of the United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the Academy of Science of France.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Prof. Asaph Hall, of the United States Naval Observatory, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept from the Academy of Sciences of the Institute of France a gold medal, known as the Arago prize medal, awarded in recognition of scientific services.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT], and I therefore yield to him for such statement as he desires to make.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to make a lengthy statement. Prof. Hall's services to astronomy are very remarkable. His discovery of the two satellites of Mars, while he was in charge of the Naval Observatory, was one of the most remarkable contributions to astronomy that had been made for some centuries, and the French Institute of Science, like all scientific bodies in the world, recognized the merit and distinction of this discovery and voted him this medal bearing the name of Arago, one of the most illustrious of French astronomers.

It seems necessary for Congress to pass this bill because the French Institute of Science is to a certain extent connected with the French Government, or some of the officers who have the administration of it are appointed by the Government of France, and have been, I believe, since the time of the First Napoleon. Possibly if Prof. Hall were to accept this decoration as bestowed by a purely scientific society he might be considered as coming within the prohibition of the Constitution; and therefore the Senate thought it best, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House have thought it best, following the lead of the Senate, to present this bill in order to avoid any possible cavil at his acceptance of this medal.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6558) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes, relating to mining claims.

CAPT. T. O. SELFRIDGE, JR.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I now call up Senate joint resolution 72.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. 72) to permit Capt. T. O. Selfridge, jr., United States Navy, to receive a decoration conferred upon him by the President of the Republic of France.

Resolved, etc., That Capt. Thomas O. Selfridge, jr., of the United States Navy, be, and is hereby, authorized to accept the cross of an officer of the national order of the Legion of Honor conferred upon him by the President of the Republic of France in recognition of the services rendered by that officer to the cause of science through his surveys of the Isthmus of Darien.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Commander C. H. Davis, of the United States Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept the decoration of "Commandador de numero de la Real Orden de Isabel la Catolica" conferred upon him by the King of Spain in recognition of his services while detailed to attend the Infanta of Spain during her visit to this country.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to hear some explanation of what he did.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will have a letter of the Assistant Secretary of State read.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think the gentleman ought to explain the bill.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 12, 1894.

SIR: At the instance of the Secretary of the Navy, I embody herein the text of the letter to you of the 14th ultimo in relation to the decoration conferred upon Commander C. H. Davis:

"At the instance of the Secretary of the Navy, I have the honor to ask that permission may be granted by Congress to Commander C. H. Davis, United States Navy, to accept the decoration known as 'Commandador de numero de la Real Orden de Isabel la Catolica' conferred upon him by His Majesty the King of Spain in recognition of his services while detailed to attend the Infanta of Spain during her visit to this country."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWIN F. UHL,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JAMES B. McCREARY,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. This is purely a local bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the Committee on Commerce will be stated in their order.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, after the word "maintain," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation;" so as to read:

That the Dubuque and Wisconsin Bridge Company, a corporation duly organized and incorporated under the laws of the State of Iowa, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, a bridge for the passage of vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot passengers across the Mississippi River, from a point at or near Eagle Point, in the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to the opposite shore of said river in the county of Grant, in the State of Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 24, after the word "required," to insert;

And should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and the said structure shall at all times be so kept and managed and provided with such guard fences, shear-booms, and other structures, as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of vessels and other floating craft through or under said structure; and for the safety of vessels passing at night there shall be displayed on said bridge, from the hours of sunset to sunrise, such lights as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board; and the said structure shall be changed or removed at the cost or expense of the owners thereof, from time to time, as Congress may direct so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said river, and the authority to erect and continue said bridge shall be subject to revocation and modification by law when the public good, in the judgment of Congress, so requires without any expense or charge to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 4, after the word "over," to strike out the words "the middle of;" and in line 8, before the word "feet," to strike out "fifty-two" and insert "fifty-five;" so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 4, after the word "regulation," to insert "from time to time;" and in the same line, after the words "by the," to strike out "local, municipal, or county authorities, under the laws of the States of Iowa and Wisconsin, respectively" and insert "Secretary of War, and approval by the Secretary of War;" so as to make the section read:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but I do not know what power the Senate of the United States has to direct an executive officer what to do in a certain case, and I therefore ask the Senator to change the language of the resolution.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will modify the resolution by striking out the word "directed" and inserting "requested."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. MILLS. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is not present, and it seems to me he ought to be present when the resolution is acted upon. I ask that the resolution may lie over until to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty-fourth."

Mr. PLATT. There is no objection to the correction of the bill, but I ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he has looked into the precedents in regard to correcting bills to ascertain whether this is according to our precedent?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is, where the bill is still in the possession of Congress. The chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills in the House concurs in this view, as does the committee of the Senate.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF THE REVENUE BILL IN CONFERENCE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow that resolution to be passed over for to-day. I inquire if he has any particular purpose in taking it up at present? I desire to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill to change the boundaries of the judicial districts of the State of Florida.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the resolution is likely to lead to much debate. I can not give way. The resolution comes up now regularly in the morning hour, and if it goes over now it will lose its place. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HALE, as follows:

Whereas on the 3d day of July, 1894, the bill H. R. 4864, an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, passed the Senate with sundry amendments; and

Whereas the Senate thereupon asked for a conference with the House of Representatives upon said bill and amendments, and the following Senators were appointed as managers of such conference on the part of the Senate, to wit: Senators VOORHEES, HARRIS, VEST, JONES of Arkansas, SHERMAN, ALLISON, and ALDRICH; and

Whereas on the 7th day of July, 1894, the conference so asked for by the Senate was agreed to by the House of Representatives, and the following members of the House of Representatives were appointed as managers on the part of the conference in that body, to wit, Representatives WILSON, MCMILLIN, TURNER, MONTGOMERY, REED, BURROWS, and PAYNE: and

Whereas the legitimate object of such action on the part of the two Houses was an immediate and full and free conference of all the managers of the Senate and House of Representatives together: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the chairman of the managers of said conference, on the part of the Senate, is hereby directed to inform the Senate whether a full and free conference is being held upon the bill aforesaid and amendments, and if so, at what time such conference was called together.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the resolution which I have submitted, which is now before the Senate, and which is intended to call the attention of this body and of the country to the present status of legislation upon the tariff, was not hurriedly brought before this body. It is intended in no way as a disrespectful reminder to the important conference committee which has by the act of the two Houses this whole matter in charge. It is not premature. Since the passage of the tariff bill by the Senate and the appointment of a conference committee, to which the whole subject-matter has been committed, every effort has been put forth in this body to pass the great and small appropriation bills which are necessary for the running of the Government, in order that the Senate might be ready to consider the report of the conferees upon the tariff bill when it should be submitted to to this body.

Mr. President, as showing that there is no unseemly haste in this matter, and no disposition to inopportunely stir or prod the other side or the conferees, I ask the attention of the Senate to the simple presentation of the dates and times in this case.

On the 3d day of July, ten days ago, the Senate, after long deliberation, full discussion, and repeated votes upon one proposition and another, passed the tariff bill with sundry most important amendments, revolutionizing to a great degree the form and substance and principle of the bill. The two Houses had acted upon it; each had expressed itself in the plainest possible manner; and under our parliamentary proceeding all the subjects matter of disagreement were to go to one great committee, made up of conferees appointed by the two bodies.

So great was the haste that directly the bill was passed the veteran Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who had been charged with the parliamentary management of the measure, arose and moved that the Senate ask for a conference, and that the managers on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair. The old and distinguished and practiced Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] ventured to expostulate with the Senator from Tennessee, declaring that such a proceeding was unusual; that on all great measures—and I know it to be true upon all appropriation bills—no conference is asked for by the Senate upon amendments to a House bill, because non constat the House may not agree to all the amendments and no conference be needed. The Senator from Iowa appealed to the Senator from Tennessee not to ask for a conference, but to leave that to the House of Representatives. The answer of the Senator from Tennessee was that it had been done on certain measures for years, which was true, and that the exigency was such, and so important was haste in the matter, that he demanded the conference and moved it; and the conference was appointed.

Mr. President, it was not an unknown conference; it was not a conference unattended and unsurrounded with knowledge and experience upon all details of the tariff. It was made up of the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. VOORHEES], with his Democratic associates, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], and three old Senators upon this side, representing the Finance Committee, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. The request for a conference was sent to the House of Representatives. The House did not at once appoint the conferees, but sent it to the Committee of Ways and Means, which reported it back and agreed to the conference. One week ago the House of Representatives completed the preliminary proceedings and the conferees were appointed upon that side representing both parties upon the Ways and Means Committee, which answers to our Finance Committee, and when that was done, the time for the work of that conference began.

When the last tariff bill, which has been so assailed and denounced and subjected to popular clamor, the McKinley bill, was passed, the Senator who had charge of the conference informs me that immediately after the preliminary proceedings had been gone through and the two sets of managers had been appointed, he notified the entire conference that it should assemble and consider the great subject-matter which had been committed to it by the two Houses. He did not wait, but did at once what was his duty. What was that, Mr. President? It was not by notifying a portion of the committee; it was not by going outside and finding a place where one, two, three, six, or eight men could meet, but in the committee room where the bill had been matured.

The presiding officer, the chairman of that conference, notified every conferee upon both sides to be present and consider the bill; and during the consideration of that conference, and in every conference, so far as I know, and as the Senator from Ohio, who has had larger experience in these matters than any other Senator in the Chamber, tells me, never in his experience on any tariff bill has there failed to be a prompt notice sent to the entire conference at once. There is some foundation for the course which was pursued in the other tariff bills.

The whole subject of conference committees is treated at length by the great masters and authorities upon parliamentary law. Mr. Jefferson has given pages to it, which are found in the appendix to our manual. Cushing, who is an authority, gives page after page to the subject of conference committees, and the whole sum and substance of these authors is in accordance with the course which has been pursued by the two bodies of Congress heretofore. The importance of a committee of conference is treated. The great powers it has are descanted upon. The necessity for immediate action is stated by Cushing and Jefferson, and it is declared time and again, and I might read from the text before me, but I shall not take the time of the Senate, that all the conferees are to participate, if possible, in every conference that takes place, and that no stranger shall be admitted to the conference any more than by the vote or leave of the two Houses they should be admitted to the floor.

The whole subject is invested with the greatest importance, the greatest exigency, the greatest solemnity. Our rules recognize it by declaring that a conference report shall have the highest privilege, that it shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read, or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

There is nobody, there is no select committee, there is no organ of either House that has so much power and has such privileges as a committee of conference.

I do not deem it inopportune to call attention to the matter after ten days have passed since the bill was concluded here, and a week after the conference had been agreed to in the House of Representatives and the committee met, when inquiries have been made in every direction as to where is the conference and nobody can tell. It is asked what has become of the tariff bill, and no man can disclose. It is a lost bill, so far as any knowledge of the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives and the country are concerned.

The members of the conference upon this side of the Chamber, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], sit in their seats every day and are attending to the duties of other matters which are coming up before the body. When asked, as we have a right to ask, how is the conference getting on, how far have you got, what are you doing with iron and coal, and what show does the sugar trust make in your deliberations, the answer is "We can not tell you," or the answer is "We do not know," or the answer is "We have had no notification of any meeting, and so far as we know no conference is being held."

Mr. President, in view of what has been done by the two Houses of Congress, in view of this lapse of time, in view of the intense heated weather which is upon us, and in view of the fact that we are passing day by day the great appropriation bills, and will soon have them out of the way and be ready to confront the next stage upon this subject, is it in any way premature or in any way a disrespect to the committee of conference to call the attention of the Senate, by the resolution I have offered, which speaks in plain terms, to the subject, as I have done, and ask that we be informed whether any conference has been ordered and where it is?

I do not choose now to take any more of the time of the Senate. It may be there will be no objection to the resolution. It may be it will be passed nem. con. The chairman may answer that the conferees are in session or are to be in session and will devote themselves to the subject-matter; but we have a right to know, sir, and the country has a right to know, where the bill is now and whether anything is being done with it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, to begin with, I have the highest personal regard for the conferees appointed from the other side of the Chamber—the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Iowa, and the Senator from Rhode Island. I wish to state to them, without reference to any other Senator, that I am utterly incapable of purposely committing an impoliteness or a breach of courtesy toward them, or either of them. If in my haste to get to work and to get the bill in shape for the action of the two Houses of Congress I have been neglectful of any duty in that regard, I am ready to make all proper amends. In speaking, however, to at least one of the Senators to whom I have alluded he found no fault with what was going on.

Suppose the full committee had been called together. It would necessarily have been only for a brief session, and then we would have had to go on as we are going on now. The majority members of the committee on tariff legislation have at all times first perfected their lines of action and first agreed upon the bill for which they were to be responsible to the country. That is what we are trying to do now.

I have not the slightest hesitation in talking frankly to the Senate and to the country on this subject. On Monday last I hurriedly called together the conferees from the House and the Senate, representing the majority of this Congress, and in a half hour after we met we were at work arranging those differences of opinion which it is well known prevail between the two Houses, so that as soon as possible we might be able to submit what we thought the bill should be to the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are to meet with us.

We have hurried along and worked very hard, Mr. President. We have wasted no time, and we have been guilty of no intentional disrespect whatever to the Republican members of the committee of conference. But before the conference can occur which has to take place between the two lines of thought, between the two policies of this Government, of protection on the one hand, or a tariff for revenue on the other, the party responsible to the country for the pending legislation must have an agreement amongst its own members. That is all there is to this. It is well understood. There is no trouble about it at all. I say to the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, the distinguished Senators from Ohio, Iowa, and Rhode Island, that at the earliest moment we come to an understanding amongst ourselves they will be advised of the fact, our work will be submitted to them, and we will go into conference with them in the fullest and amplest manner.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me for a moment?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I appreciate the frank statement of the Senator, that the delay has been caused by the meeting together of the conferees on the majority side of both Houses in order to come to an agreement among themselves. That is a frank statement, which shows what has been done, and the Senator from Indiana is entitled to credit for his frankness. He says then, that when that is done he will call the Republican conferees into session with them.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I beg the Senator to tell the Senate what use it will be to call the Republican conferees into session with the Democratic conferees when the Democrats have agreed upon a policy and a bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. The advantage is that which always arises from intelligent people conversing with each other; and if in such conference the distinguished Senators on the other side of the Chamber can show that we are in error, can show where improvement can be made in what we have agreed upon, where amendments should take place, we will thank them, and we will be glad to have such assistance.

There is no arbitrary dogmatism in what we are doing. There will be a full and free conference, with an earnest purpose to arrive at the wisest conclusions possible; and we shall feel aided by their suggestions in many respects. For instance, take the Senator from Iowa. He is an authority on the administrative features of any revenue measure which comes before Congress. I am glad to bear public testimony to that fact. Much is left in the bill on which he will be listened to with great respect and with great profit.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Indiana, who has had a large experience here, having been in the Senate longer than I have, remember any precedent where such a course as he has frankly stated is now being followed was pursued as to a tariff bill or any other bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. So far as the technical precedent is concerned, I do not recall any. But suppose I had called together the entire committee of conference. It would only have been to have said to them as I say here, "We, gentlemen, begging your pardon, meaning no discourtesy, must have our separate consideration of this measure, and then we will submit our work to you." That has been done a hundred times in the history of our Government. It was done in 1883; it was done in 1890; it was done this spring. I do not mean particularly in regard to conference committees, but in the formation of the bill itself.

Mr. HALE. I meant in conference committees. I know that has been done in the formation of bills by both parties.

Mr. VOORHEES. As to conference committees, I say I do not just now recall a precedent, for this matter came upon me suddenly, a few moments ago, while we were hard at work upstairs. I was a member of the committee of conference on the McKinley bill. I do not remember, nor do I care to remember, nor is it of the slightest importance to me whether the entire committee was first formally called together and the minority then dismissed to await the action of the majority. But I do remember and I do know, and so do Senators on the other side of the Chamber, who are members of the present conference committee, that they took their bill, as they ought to have done and as was proper and right, and made it to suit themselves, and then, when they had agreed among themselves, they submitted it to the balance of the conference committee, just as we expect to do.

Now, whether the technical formality of first getting the committee together and telling the members of the minority of the committee to "Just retire now, gentlemen, and we will consider this by ourselves," was done with the McKinley bill or not, I do not know, and I have already said I do not care. If I had thought that any Senator on the other side of the Chamber, especially who is with us in the Finance Committee, would have thought it a want of proper recognition not to have so called the committee, I should have done so rather than to have had any criticism. But it would only have consumed an hour, or possibly two hours at the most, in reaching the conclusion which we reached without any delay, and that was that we had to consider this measure first amongst ourselves, and then bring our work to you.

It would only have resulted in the loss of some time. I should rather have had that, however, than to have provoked the criticism of any member of the conference committee.

I do not desire to be uncivil to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], but I will say that I am glad, if this criticism had to come, that it comes from a Senator not personally touched by anything we have done; in other words, a Senator not a member of the Committee on Finance and not a member of the committee of conference.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator sees that however members of the committee might feel about the matter, none of them would feel like coming forward and making complaint. That is most natural.

Mr. VOORHEES. That might be true as to the floor of the Senate, but I believe my relations with every member of the committee are such that if any one of them had felt that there had been an oversight on any question of propriety on my part he would not have hesitated to intimate the same to me.

No, Mr. President, nothing of that kind has been intended. We have simply intended, in the face of hard work, to get through with it as fast as we could, and then bring the result to a full and free conference; and on that position I am willing for this contention to rest.

I shall move, unless some member of the conference committee wishes to be heard, to lay the resolution on the table

Mr. ALLISON rose.

Mr. VOORHEES. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I came into the Chamber after the Senator from Indiana began his observations. I have been told by those around me that the Senator from Indiana has stated that one member of the minority of the conference committee was consulted as respects the policy to be pursued.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is not a correct statement. Let me state it over again, then the Senator from Iowa will see. I said before the Senator came in that in the hurry of getting to work and getting this question off I had called the committee together on Monday without a formal call; that since then, thinking perhaps there might be some question about the mere technical propriety of my course, I had spoken to one member of the committee of conference on the other side of the Chamber, and that I had found no personal complaint in his mind. That is the substance of what I said.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; that is, in substance, true. I casually met the Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, I think on yesterday morning as I entered the corridor below. Some jocular remark was made by me as respects his being busily occupied. Then the Senator said, "Perhaps I ought to have called the full conference together before our informal conference which is now going on." I think I did not in that conversation, which was purely casual, express dissent or assent.

But now that the matter is before the Senate I think I ought to say as a member of this body, and as one of the members of the conference on the part of the Senate, that I think the course now being pursued by the majority of the Senate conferees is an unusual course.

The very idea of a conference as I understand, and have always understood, is that it is to reconcile differences between the two Houses. The conferees on the part of the Senate are supposed to represent honestly and fairly the views and sentiments of this body, whilst the conferees on the part of the other House are supposed to represent the views and sentiments of that body upon the differences on all bills which are submitted to conference committees.

I had never supposed, and I am loath now to suppose for a moment, that the four Senate conferees of the majority of the Senate conferees and the four House conferees of the majority will gather together and make amendments and withdrawals and concessions as respects the bill which are to be binding upon a majority of each side in the conference, and then submit their work formally to the three Senators on this side of the Chamber in this body and the three members of the minority in the other body, and we are simply to be present and record the ipse dixit of the four men on one side in the Senate and four men on the same side in the other House who are now consulting without the authority of either body.

I can not for a moment suppose that these conferees are engaged in the serious business of making concessions, one side to the other, or making modifications to the bill to be carried formally before the conferees of this body. I do not suppose (and I do not gather from the Senator from Indiana, who is chairman of the committee) that that discourtesy is to be placed upon the minority, or upon the Senate, or that the rules governing conference committees from their formation in the beginning of the British Parliament to this moment are thus to be violated.

Understanding as I do that these conferences are informal, and not formal conferences, and that no agreements are being made which bind anybody, I do not object to informal conferences suited to the convenience of these gentlemen. But if we are to be mere bystanders when the formal conference is called by the Senator from Indiana, then, for one, I think it is better that the conference ordered by this body, and assented to by the other House, should be dissolved without further delay.

Mr. VOORHEES. I renew my motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to say a few words.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is quite true that I have made no objection to the policy which has been pursued because I have not been consulted in regard to the matter. I heard my name read as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate upon the bill. Since that time I have had no knowledge whatever of any action on the part of any members of the conference or the conferees as a whole. I suppose that owing to the great pressure upon the business interests of the country, which has been so frequently alluded to by my distinguished friend from Tennessee, requiring haste in this matter, at some time in the future the conference would be called together and all the managers on the part of the Senate and all the managers on the part of the other House would enter into a full and free conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I suppose now that that will be done; and that any private agreements which may be made by members of this body will have no binding force or effect whatever upon the managers when they shall assemble.

I see no reason why members of the Senate should not talk over in private conference any subject which they please to consider; but that they can in any sense represent the Senate of the United States in such a conference is not true. All the managers on the part of the Senate are of equal dignity and equal power, if I understand at all the rules which apply to a conference committee. Many of the amendments which were made by the Senate were adopted by the votes of Senators upon this side of the Chamber as well as upon the other.

The action of the Senate is represented by its seven managers appointed by the Vice-President of the United States, and they have an equal right and an equal power in the consideration of the measure. I take it that when the real consideration commences, whenever it shall be, whether this week or next week, or next month or next year, there will be no disposition on the part of any Senators upon the other side to preclude or foreclose the fullest and freest discussion upon every disagreeing vote between the two Houses. I assume that that will be done.

Now, as to the conferences which have taken place in the past I will state that I was in 1883 a member of the conference on the part of the Senate and also a member of the conference of 1890. I presided over the conference of 1890. I called the conferees together the next morning after the other House had appointed its managers. I called all of them together and they remained in session every day until an agreement was reached on the part of the managers. Every single question pertaining to the matter, every disagreeing vote between the two Houses, was discussed openly in the room of the Committee on Finance by the conference, the Democratic members of the conference being present. I will not say that they were all present all the time, but there was no time when some Democratic member was not there.

Mr. ALLISON. They were all notified.

Mr. ALDRICH. They were all notified, and all expected to be there. There was no discussion, public or private, on any of the disagreeing votes at which the Democratic members were not invited, and they took part in the discussion if they saw fit to do so. There was no private conference of any kind in connection with the bill of 1890, and there was no disposition or endeavor on the part of certain members of the Senate conferees to try to come to any agreement with certain members of the House conferees as to amendments in the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator will allow me to say that that will be exactly repeated when the conference is called. This is not a conference that is going on. Whenever the conference is called just what the Senator says took place then will take place again.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not what I understand to be the Senator's position.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand that I have a right to criticise anything that has been done except the delay which is taking place and which may be prolonged indefinitely when there is a disposition certainly on the part of Congress to dispose of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to say to the Senator that I regret the delay more than he does.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was also a member of the conference committee of 1883; and I will say that in that conference, which was called immediately after the managers were appointed on the part of both Houses, there was no meeting of the committee at which there was not a Democratic manager on the part of the House of Representatives present. There never was a private conference or a private session of any members of that committee anywhere, to my knowledge, and I think I should have known it if there had been.

Now, I do not object to the delay if the Senator from Indiana and those who are acting with him believe that it is imperative; but I do object to the implication which is contained in the statement of the Senator from Indiana, that when they have agreed, then the action will be submitted to the full conference. I say that whatever the Senator from Indiana may be doing in regard to this matter (and I have no knowledge of it whatever), he is doing it upon his responsibility as an individual, and that he does not and can not in any sense represent the Senate of the United States.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is correct. I accept that statement. I act on my own responsibility as a Senator and not as a conferee.

Mr. ALDRICH. But I say I object to the implication which the Senator from Indiana made, that there was some agreement being reached, or that there might be some agreement reached, by irresponsible parties which would have or might be intended to have some force or effect upon the conference when it does meet.

Mr. VOORHEES. I meant to make no such statement or implication.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, although I do not take very much interest in the subject-matter, I feel bound to say a few words in respect to this question, lest my silence might imply something that would not be true. I am inclined to think that the Senator from Indiana, who is always courteous and kind, made a mistake in not getting the committee together immediately. Then if a suggestion had been made to the minority that there were political questions involved in the tariff bill, as there are, and that on the whole it was thought better for them to consider those questions among themselves, we certainly would not wish to share in their councils, and there would have been no difficulty. We would not have attended, that is all; we would have remained away. I think that was a good deal the course pursued with the McKinley bill.

The doors were always open and notices were given to every member of the conference to be present without distinction of party, but many of the Democratic Senators did not attend. I doubt very much whether during the conference more than perhaps one or two attended; but it was all open. Certainly if we had been notified that there were political considerations to be dealt with by the representatives of the majority in the two Houses we would not have forced ourselves upon their attention.

Now, that is the way the matter stands. I think that the majority members of the committee of conference ought to confine their consideration to such portions of the bill as they recognize as political in character, where they are called upon as a party to unite; but to go beyond that it seems to me would be a violation of the usages and customs of the Senate, because if anything is sacred in a great body like our Congress, composed of two separate Houses, it is a free conference, which is the only final solution of all the difficulties that occur and necessarily occur in the consideration of any bill, whether of little or of great importance.

Therefore I think that as soon as everything in the nature of political questions is disposed of or agreed upon or disagreed to, the conferees ought to come together and then go over the items in disagreement between the two Houses, because we think we shall be able to convince our brothers of the conference in regard to some matters that are in dispute. They ought to listen to us, at least, representing a great minority in this country, and we ought not to be precluded from what would be a free, open, and full conference between friends. This is all I desire to say.

Mr. VOORHEES. I simply beg to say in response to the closing remarks of the senior Senator from Ohio that there will undoubtedly be afforded a full and free conference in the most liberal sense of that word. Whether a mistake was made on my part, in my haste to get the matter in shape to submit to the conference or not, I am quite sure the Senator from Ohio will acquit me of at least any intentional disrespect to the members of the conference committee.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know that any further words are necessary, and I will ask the Senator from Maine, as a more respectful mode perhaps of disposing of his resolution than laying it on the table, to let it go to the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. It would naturally go to the Calendar. I do not object to that course. It will depend on what happens in the next few days whether I shall call it up. It is a proper suggestion that the resolution shall go to the Calendar, and I do not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the resolution will go to the Calendar.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRICE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same.

CALVIN S. BRICE,
S. M. CULLOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOS. H. O'NEIL,
J. R. WILLIAMS,
HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

FLORIDA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 51, to change the boundaries of the judicial districts of the State of Florida.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 51) to change the boundaries of the judicial districts of the State of Florida.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say with regard to this bill that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary favoring the bill is not a unanimous report. I did not concur in the report and other members of the committee did not concur in the report. It seems perhaps to be an ungracious matter to oppose the redistricting of a State as requested by its Senators. They are usually supposed to be best informed as to the necessities of their State, as to the convenience of the litigants in their State; but there are some things with regard to this proposed redistricting to which I think attention should be called.

The bill proposes to take from the judge in Florida who now does most of the business the great bulk of the business which is transacted in the court over which he presides and give it to another judge, who is required by law to live not near the spot where the courts are to be held in the district, but 500 miles away, at the very remotest portion of the State of Florida. I do not think that even geographically the division is a fair one.

The reason of this action may as well be stated. Certain parties in Florida have taken offense at something this judge has done, and propose by these means to legislate the business away from him and give it to another judge. Indeed, it is said (and I know nothing about the facts) that he has done things for which he ought to be impeached. That is the claim made by parties who advocate this redistricting; but rather than resort to impeachment proceedings, it is proposed by a redistricting of the State to practically take away his business from him, and let him go on with a lesser amount of business.

I submit that that is not a proper ground for redistricting the State. It may be said that the former districting of the State was unequal, but I think it will not be denied that the real ground for redistricting at the present time is to be found in a desire to take business away from a United States judge who has either rightfully or wrongfully incurred the displeasure of a portion of the people of Florida.

With this statement of the matter I do not desire to discuss it further. I suppose that any discussion will be unavailing, as will opposition to any other political measure which has been thoroughly agreed upon by the dominant party in the Senate. I can only enter a protest and call for a vote.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate with any argument upon this subject. I will simply state the facts. The present boundaries of the judicial districts of Florida are extremely inconvenient to the people who have business in the courts. One district embraces almost the entire State of Florida, and persons who are required to be present at court in the transaction of business have in many cases to travel 400, 500, 600, and 700 miles. The proposed change in the boundaries of the districts creates a far greater equality in population and territory and furnishes far greater convenience to all persons who have business to transact in the different parts of the State.

The proposed change in the boundaries of the districts meets the approval of, I suppose, nine-tenths of all the people of the State of Florida, without respect to party. The Senator from Connecticut is mistaken in the idea that the bill is advocated upon the ground of dissatisfaction with the judge. There may be such dissatisfaction and there may be cause for it; but that has been carefully excluded from consideration in the bill. The bill stands before the Senate upon the unanimous recommendation of the delegation from the State both in the other House and in the Senate and of the people of the State of Florida without reference to any other consideration than that of the convenience of business and the proper division of the State into judicial districts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DUCK RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

Mr. BATE. I wish to call up Senate bill 2055, a very short bill, authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge. There is no contest about it of any kind.

Mr. RANSOM. All right; I will yield to the Senator from Tennessee for that purpose.

Mr. BATE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2055) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Duck River, in Humphreys County, Tenn.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to add as a new section:

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FINAL PROOF AND PAYMENT ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. POWER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3458) extending the time for final proof and payment on lands claimed under the public-land laws of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the time of making final payments on entries under the preemption act is hereby extended for one year from the date when the same becomes due in all cases where preëmption entrymen are unable to make final payments from causes which they can not control, evidence of such inability to be subject to the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Has that bill been reported by the Committee on Public Lands?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VILAS in the chair). The Chair is so advised.

Mr. PASCO. The bill was reported unanimously by the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH YAKIMA INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2015) granting to the Columbia Irrigation Company a right of way through the Yakima Indian Reservation in Washington.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the words "Yakima River," to strike out "Toppenish and Satus Creeks;" and in line 5, after the words "of this," to strike out "bill" and insert "act, or that may not be necessary for the domestic and irrigating purposes of any Indian to whom an allotment has been made, or shall hereafter be made, upon or along said Yakima River;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the said irrigation company shall have the right to appropriate and use any and all water necessary for their use from the Yakima River, not otherwise appropriated and in actual use at the time of the passage of this act, or that may not be necessary for the domestic and irrigating purposes of any Indian to whom an allotment has been made, or shall hereafter be made, upon or along said Yakima River.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. The word "transcribe," at the end of line 1 in section 6, is a missprint. It should be "transfer."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that correction will be made.

Mr. PLATT. I noticed, in listening to the reading of the bill, that there is no provision that Congress reserves to itself the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act. I think a provision of that kind should be inserted in all acts, and I move an amendment to add as a new section:

The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DEALINGS IN OPTIONS AND FUTURES.

Mr. GEORGE. Some days ago a bill from the House of Representatives on the subject of dealings in options and futures, was laid upon the table, there being a dispute between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] as to the particular committee to which it should be referred.

The bill is in relation to a very important subject. Both of those Senators have been absent for some days, and I think there should be a reference of that bill either to the Committee on Agriculture, which the Senator from Minnesota asked, or to the Committee on the Judiciary, which the Senator from Massachusetts preferred.

My own inclination was, owing to the very important constitutional question involved in the bill, that it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary; but the Senator from Minnesota, who takes a great interest in the bill and is a member of the Committee on Agriculture, desired that the bill should go to the Committee on Agriculture. I am indifferent myself to which committee it goes, but it ought to go somewhere, so that action shall be taken; and with the view of testing the sense of the Senate as to which committee they will refer this particular bill, I will renew the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, being myself utterly indifferent to which of the two committees it be referred.

Mr. BATE. I doubt the propriety of taking action upon the reference of the bill in the absence of both the Senators referred to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the Senate is very thin. This is a matter in which a good many Senators are interested, and especially the two Senators who contend about the reference, and who are absent. I wish the Senator from Mississippi would give notice that some day next week he will bring the matter up. If he insists on moving the reference now, I shall have to take some little time in expressing my opinion as to which committee the bill ought to be referred.

I do not think, however, that a matter of this kind, where the contention has already commenced between two Senators, who both happen to be absent at this time, ought to be decided in their absence. I wish the Senator from Mississippi would give notice that some day next week he will renew this motion, and those Senators can then be advised of his motion, and be here or not, as they like.

Mr. GEORGE. There is force in what the Senator from Connecticut says; but there is a very large portion of our countrymen who take a very great interest, if not in this particular bill, at least in the matter with which it deals. Both those Senators left here about ten days ago; the bill is lying on the table without action; the session of Congress is about to expire; and I felt that if I did not take some action in reference to the matter, I should be charged with a dereliction of duty.

I shall, however, so far yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut as to give notice that on Monday next I shall ask that the bill be referred to one or the other of the committees I have named; I do not care to which.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi withdraw his motion?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; I withdraw it.

INDIAN ENGAGEMENTS.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask consent to enter a motion to reconsider a resolution which was passed a few days since, calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information in regard to hostilities with Indian tribes. I desire to have the resolution reconsidered and recalled.

Mr. PLATT. Was the resolution passed or was it indefinitely postponed?

Mr. LINDSAY. The resolution was passed. It was a resolution introduced at the instance of the Attorney-General to enable him to obtain certain information from the War Department. It has been discovered that the cost for the information will be very much in excess of its value. I ask to have the vote by which the resolution was passed reconsidered, in order that a modified resolution may be presented and adopted.

Mr. PLATT. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves the recall of the resolution referred to by him in order to move its reconsideration. The question is on the motion of the Senator to recall the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1343) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Joseph G. Utter.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 6558) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4858) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WASHINGTON, Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. BINGHAM managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 73) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell;

A bill (S. 1573) making an appropriation for rewriting the Consular Regulations;

A bill (H. R. 4671) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Joseph G. Utter;

A bill (H. R. 5691) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the South, or Main, Canadian River, at or near the town of Noble, in Oklahoma Territory;

A bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895; and

A bill (H. R. 7506) authorizing the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds for the construction of a county building at the county seat thereof.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4858) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. CALL, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. HALE were appointed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6518, being the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6518) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 49, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "forty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Big Sandy River, near Louisa, Ky.: For continuing construction of movable dam in accordance with the existing plans, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 15, to insert:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineers of the Army, whose duty it shall be to survey the Miami and Erie Canal, connecting the waters of Lake Erie, at Toledo, in the State of Ohio, with the Ohio River, at Cincinnati, Ohio, and to report as to the feasibility and advisability of improving and widening said canal to 70 feet at the water line, and deepening the same to 7 feet, and by construction of new locks not less than 150 feet in length and 21 feet in width, with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden, and to report to the next session of Congress with detailed plans and an estimate of the cost of such improvement; and $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the cost of said survey, is hereby appropriated: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to commit the Government to proceed with the construction of said improvement.

Mr. BRICE. I desire to state that on consultation with my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN], and after a hearing by the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VILAS in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out lines 19 and 20, as follows:

Connecting the waters of Lake Erie, at Toledo, in the State of Ohio, with the Ohio River, at Cincinnati, Ohio, and to.

And insert:

The Ohio Canal and such branches thereof, and such river and stream channels as may, in their judgment, form available portions of a continuous canal, connecting the waters of Lake Erie with the Ohio River, through the State of Ohio, and to.

Mr. RANSOM. That amendment is right. It only carries out the idea originally entertained.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRICE. I also desire to move another amendment to the amendment of the committee, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment in line 22, by striking out "said," before "canal," and inserting "such;" and on page 51, line 3, before the word "thousand," by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. RANSOM. That is all right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 52, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Ohio River by the construction of a movable dam at or below the mouth of Beaver River, Pennsylvania: Continuing improvement, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina, in charge of the bill, to an error in the item on page 17, at the bottom of that page, which reads:

Improving harbor at Sandusky, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $25,000

The committee have allowed $5,000 for removing a shoal at the outer approach to the harbor. It will be necessary, therefore, to increase the total amount to $30,000.

Mr. RANSOM. That is right. Five thousand dollars is considered as an addition to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line 22, I move to strike out "twenty-five," and to insert "thirty," so that the $5,000 will be an additional appropriation, instead of being paid out of the previous appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "improvement," in line 22, on page 17, it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Sandusky, Ohio: Continuing improvement, $30,000, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 30 of the bill. The Coal Exchange of the city of Pittsburg have forwarded to me an amendment, with the request that I offer it at this point. I send it to the Secretary's desk. I trust the point of order will not be made upon the amendment, but that the chairman of the committee will accept it.

Mr. RANSOM. Let me hear the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. RANSOM. I wish Senators would wait until we get through with the committee amendments before they offer their amendments. I shall, however, hear the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator raise a point of order on the amendment?

Mr. RANSOM. No, sir; I do not make any point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from North Carolina to desire the reading of the bill before individual amendments are offered.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir; but as the Senator from Pennsylvania has already offered an amendment, which he has sent to the desk, I will hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "directed," in line 18, on page 30, to the end of the paragraph, as follows:

To investigate and report to the next Congress the sum of money necessary to acquire by purchase the locks and dams on the Monogahela River, in Pennsylvania, belonging to the Monongahela Navigation Company, as a whole, and separately.

And insert:

To appoint a commissioner to conduct negotiations with the Monongahela Navigation Company to ascertain the sum of money necessary to acquire by purchase the locks and dams on the Monongahela River, in Pennsylvania, belonging to said company, and also to take testimony as to the value of said improvements and the commercial importance of free navigation of said river, and to report the same to the Secretary of War, together with such other information as may bear upon the subject; and the Secretary of War shall report thereon to Congress at its next succeeding session, to the end that Congress may determine as to the expediency of making the navigation of said river free from tolls. And the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, is hereby appropropriated out of the moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated for the purpose of paying said commissioner and the expenses of taking testimony and acquiring the other information contemplated.

Mr. QUAY. I understand that the amendment is accepted by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. There is no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the attention of the Senate for one second. I hope Senators will be here to move such amendments as they desire to the amendments of the committee as they are reached in the reading of the bill, and not ask to go back ten, twenty, or thirty pages to offer their amendments. I must object to that being done.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I understand that the chairman of the committee desires that the reading of the bill shall be concluded and the committee amendments acted upon before individual amendments are offered.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 52, after line 2, to insert:

Improving Ohio River, in Pennsylvania, by the construction of a movable dam, numbered two, as located by the Secretary of War: For purchase of site and commencement of dam, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving the water communication across Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior, from Keweenaw Bay to Lake Superior, in the State of Michigan, in accordance with the existing project, $160,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 14, on page 54.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "fifteen," in line 14, and inserting "thirty." I trust the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. RANSOM. I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "improvement," in line 14, page 54, strike out "fifteen" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Improving Red River of the North, Minnesota: Continuing improvements, $30,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 55, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Illinois River, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, after line 10, to insert:

For examination and survey for the location of a canal connecting Lake Superior and the Mississippi River, $10,000; and the engineers making said examination and survey shall report the most feasible route for such canal, either by way of the St. Croix, Rum, or Upper Mississippi Rivers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "sixty;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert:

so as make the clause read:

For care and maintenance of reservoirs at the head waters of the Mississippi River $60,000, and so much thereof as shall be required shall be expended in completing connections, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, after line 22, to insert:

Improving the Mississippi River between the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha Railroad bridge at St. Paul to the Washington Avenue bridge at Minneapolis. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to appropriate the unexpended balance standing to the credit of this improvement to further improvement under the project or plan to extend navigation from St. Paul to the flour mills at Minneapolis, estimated for by Maj. A. McKenzie as appears by his report made to Gen. Thomas L. Casey, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, under date of March 1, 1894. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for all of the materials and work necessary to complete lock and dam numbered 2 in said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $560,000, exclusive of the amount herein authorized to be expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to move to amend the amendment of the committee in this case. I send to the desk the amendment which was offered to the original bill before the amendment of the committee was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "thousand," in line 2, page 58, strike out "forty" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred;" so as to read:

At the harbor of Memphis, Tenn.: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, some months ago the mayor of Memphis addressed to me a letter, calling my attention to the condition of the harbor of that city. I requested him to have the local engineer give me full and accurate information as to the condition of the harbor and its then absolute necessities. As the briefest and clearest statement which I can make of the condition of affairs there, I ask the Secretary to read the letter addressed to the mayor and by him sent to me, which gives an account of the condition of things at Memphis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

IMPROVING MISSISSIPPI RIVER, FIRST AND SECOND DISTRICTS.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
99 Madison street, Memphis, Tenn., May 22, 1894.

SIR: As requested by you, I have the honor to say that the sum of $100,000 will be required to execute the improvement contemplated for Memphis harbor.

The proposed improvement consists in completing the bank protection along the city front. The length of the city front from the mouth of Wolf River to the bridge is 13,300 feet. Of this, 9,500 feet has already been protected as follows:

From the mouth of Wolf River to the foot of Beale street it is protected by brush and stone mattresses laid at different times between 1878 and 1887. For a distance of 2,100 feet below Beale street the bank is protected by the citizens' dikes placed in 1886-'87, and for a distance of 1,000 feet above the bridge it is protected by a revetment placed by the bridge company as a protection to its shore pier. The only piece of bank unprotected is that included between the lower end of the citizens' dikes and the bridge company's revetment, a distance of about 3,800 feet. The caving here, formerly of slow progress, has shown increased activity during the past year. A large cave occurred in June of 1893 and a second one in April of this year. Both were caused by the strong current to which this bank is now exposed.

Before the creation of the bar at the upper portion of the city the current exerted its most vigorous action on the Tennessee shore in the vicinity of the mouth of Wolf River, but as the bar grew in width and height the point of greatest attack was gradually forced downstream, and at the present time the current exerts its greatest force along the citizens' dikes and the piece of unprotected bank referred to. The revetment of this bank has, in consequence of the active caving manifested during the past year, become a work of some urgency, and it would be exceedingly advantageous if it could be done in a single season.

As I stated in an official report on this subject, any considerable recession of the bank here must be guarded against to prevent the formation of an eddy at the shore pier of the main channel span of the bridge and to prevent the current from taking an oblique direction through the bridge spans, both of which events would surely occur if the bank is allowed to cave back much farther behind its present location. Incidentally, the revetment will protect very valuable property on the bank now threatened with loss by caving, but the chief reason or necessity for an early execution of the work is its influence in maintaining the current in a proper direction through the bridge and preventing the formation of an eddy in the channel span.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. W. ROESSLER,
Captain of Engineers.

Hon. W. L. CLAPP,
Mayor City of Memphis, Tenn.

Mr. HARRIS. From the report of the engineer in charge of the work there it appears that under former appropriations the Tennessee shore has been protected down to Beale street, which is near the center of the city. From Beale street down the citizens have protected for some 2,000 or 2,100 feet, as stated in the report. For a thousand feet above the bridge the bridge company has protected, but it leaves a gap of 2,000 or a little over 2,000 feet wholly unprotected between the protection the citizens have given and the protection that the bridge company has given.

It seems that the current is setting in upon the bank and producing very rapid caving. The current of the Mississippi River is not much of a respector of the installment plan, and it is dangerous to let this work go uncompleted for another year, as the caving may go on so as to come in behind and to wash out behind the improvement which the bridge company has already made, and effect the eastern pier of the great bridge which was constructed there a few years ago. Even if it has not that effect, the washing in at that point, the engineer reports, may produce an eddy at or near the bridge and drive the current through the bridge spans, which are in an oblique direction, and that would make navigation exceedingly unsafe. The engineer reports $100,000 as necessary to complete this improvement.

Now, my fear is that if we appropriate thirty, forty, or fifty thousand dollars to go on with the work at this time, and let it go on for another year without completion, it will result practically in the loss of the forty or fifty thousand dollars which we may invest in the work at this time, and perhaps hereafter we will have to appropriate an equal amount to remedy the evil. That is the view I take of it. In view of that consideration, I think the wisest and most economical policy we can pursue is to make the appropriation which the engineer says is necessary to complete the work. This is all I desire to say.

Mr. RANSOM. In deference to the statement made before the Committee on Commerce by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, who has just spoken, the committee doubled the House appropriation for Memphis Harbor. The account of that place which the Senator from Tennessee has given is very accurate, and the reasons he gives why the appropriation should be made are good. But the Senate must not forget that in making these appropriations nowhere scarcely can the committee or the Senate give the full amount asked for. It is very rare, as the Senator from Tennessee well knows, that that is done.

Mr. CULLOM. The rule is to give one-quarter.

Mr. RANSOM. The rule adopted by the committee has been to allow one-quarter. But I leave that out of view, because we all know the importance of the harbor at Memphis. It is a very important one, and the Senator's statement is correct and has great force in it. The committee have every disposition to save Memphis Harbor, and to hear what the Senator from Tennessee says. But it does seem to me that for the present an appropriation of $50,000 to save Memphis Harbor is fair. I say that, sir, after some reflection upon the subject, and I hope the Senator from Tennessee will agree to an amendment making the appropriation $50,000 and will not insist upon an appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. HARRIS. If this case is not clearly exceptional, I should not expect to be dealt with other than as other localities and other Senators are dealt with, and if the Commerce Committee is satisfied that it is not sufficiently exceptional to make it an exceptional case and make the full appropriation, while the rule of the committee is otherwise, I shall be bound to acquiesce in the conclusions and decisions of the committee. But in my judgment we are risking the money we put into the partial improvement, whereas by making at once the appropriation which the engineer says is necessary, we will have completed the work and have no further trouble with it.

Mr. RANSOM. I am now satisfied that $50,000 is the proper appropriation to be made in this case. There are a great many other cases in the United States exactly like this one, and we could not go the full amount. I will move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "forty," and inserting "fifty."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two amendments are now pending to this paragraph, one upon the other.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope no question of order will be raised, and that the sense of the Senate will be tested upon the amendment now proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 58, after line 6, to strike out:

At the head of the Atchafalaya and the mouth of Red River, Louisiana, for improvement thereof with a view to maintain navigation between the Atchafalaya and Red Rivers and dredging Upper Old River, $70,000, of which $2,500 may be used in improving Bayou Des Glaises, in the parish of Avoyelles, and the Mississippi River Commission is directed to report to Congress on the advisibility of effecting a separation between the Mississippi and Red Rivers.

And insert:

At the head of the Atchafalaya and the mouth of Red River, Louisiana, for the rectification thereof: Continuing improvement, $70,000, of which $2,500 may be used in improving Bayou Des Glaises, in the parish of Avoyelles.

Mr. PEFFER. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out, in line 3, the word "fifty" and inserting "sixty," and in connection with that, in line 9, where the word "twenty-five" occurs to strike it out and insert "thirty-five." This will add an additional $10,000 to the total appropriation.

Mr. RANSOM. If I may interrupt the Senator from Kansas I will state that I had already given notice to his colleague [Mr. MARTIN], who has seen me on this matter, that I should not object to the amendment.

Mr. PEFFER. That, then, is sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3 of the committee amendment strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty;" and in line 9 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to make the paragraph read:

One hundred and sixty thousand dollars for improving the channel of the Missouri River at points where the volume of water is being diminished by its divergence or escape from the usual channel; of which sum the Missouri River Commission, under such plans and specifications as it may adopt, shall expend $75,000 at Omaha, Nebr.; $35,000 at Atchison, Kans., and the remainder at St. Joseph and other localities on the river, in the State of Missouri, where the Commission may deem such improvement necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

And insert:

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Upper Missouri River between Stubbs's Ferry, in Montana, and the lower limits of Sioux City, Iowa, etc.

Mr. ROACH. I have the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, in charge of the bill, to move in line 3, after the word "Bismarck," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty."

The SECRETARY. After the word "Bismarck" on page 60, line 3, strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" so as to read "$40,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ROACH. That will necessitate a change in line 21, page 59, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty-five;" so as to read "$55,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, here is a novel scheme which is proposed to be initiated and completed at an expense of $2,500,000, covering the construction and equipment of a boat railway on the Columbia River from the foot of The Dalles Rapids to the head of Celilo Falls. I should like to have the Senator from Oregon inform the Senate what work has heretofore been done upon the Columbia River between the points mentioned as the terminal points of the boat railway.

Mr. DOLPH. Nothing at all has been done. It is a new improvement.

Mr. HALE. That is what I want to know, whether any money has been expended there on this project.

Mr. DOLPH. Nothing of any kind has been done. But it has been examined by two boards, one board of five engineers and a subsequent board of seven engineers.

Mr. HALE. What is the distance between The Dalles Rapids and Celilo Falls?

Mr. DOLPH. About 13 miles I believe is the distance that the railway and the improvement of the river will cover.

Mr. HALE. Then what is to be done at Celilo Falls?

Mr. DOLPH. That is the upper end. Then you have 265 miles of open river navigation.

Mr. HALE. Has any money been expended upon the river above that point?

Mr. DOLPH. In the river there has been some money expended, but not a great amount. There have been small appropriations for the last fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. HALE. This is intended to cover a portion of the river which can not be made navigable in the channel?

Mr. DOLPH. That is it. It is a substitute for a canal, which would cost two or three times as much. This project has been examined by two boards of eminent engineers. The proposition has twice passed the Senate as a separate measure, and it was adopted by the Senate in the river and harbor bill two years ago, but was lost in conference.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator himself satisfied that it is a practical project?

Mr. DOLPH. Perfectly. It was before the Committee on Commerce two years ago——

Mr. HALE. And that it can be built for $2,500,000?

Mr. DOLPH. The estimate is $2,264,000, and there is a provision that the contract shall not be let unless the improvement can be made for that amount. One hundred and seventy thousand dollars is for river improvements, and a little over $2,000,000 for the boat railway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 64, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Lower Willamette River in front of and below Portland, Oregon, and Columbia River below the Willamette River in Oregon and Washington: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving the mouth of Siuslaw River: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "fourteen;" and in line 17, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Which, together with the unexpended balance, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, be used for repairs to snag boat;

So as to make the clause read:

Improving Puget Sound and its tributary waters, Washington: Continuing improvement, $14,000, which, together with the unexpended balance, may in the discretion of the Secretary of War, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, be used for repairs to snag boat.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 4, to insert:

For dredging Shilshole Bay and Salmon Bay, and the improvement of the water way connecting the waters of Puget Sound, at Salmon Bay, with Lakes Union and Washington by enlarging the said water way into a ship canal, with the necessary locks and appliances in connection therewith, $100,000: Provided, That no part of said amount shall be expended on the improvement of the water way connecting the waters of Puget Sound with Lakes Union and Washington until the entire right of way and a release from all liability to adjacent property owners have been secured to the United States free of cost and to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. RANSOM. In line 5, page 66, after the word "dredging," I move to strike out the words "Shilshole Bay and." It is a mistake in the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 67, after line 24, to strike out:

In all channels and harbors marked by buoys, stakes, or other channel marks, or where passage between piers or alongside of revetted banks is necessary, rafts shall be so constructed that the boom logs surrounding the rafts shall overlap each other, outward and aft, from front to rear, at least 3 feet, and be fastened together by chains, ropes, or other fastenings short enough to prevent the laps straightening out; and failure to so construct each raft shall be an offense punishable as hereinafter provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, after line 8, to strike out:

In and through connecting and connected waters of the Great Lakes, such as harbors and rivers with narrow entrances and channels, no bag rafts shall be permitted under penalty as hereinafter provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 1, after the words "St. Clair," to strike out "and" and insert "Maumee;" in line 2, after the word "Detroit," to insert "and Niagara;" in line 6, after the word "rafts," to strike out "with the logs essentially parallel to each other in the direction of raft length;" in line 8, after the word "and," to strike out:

And in line 14, after the words "provided for," to insert:

The provisions and restrictions of this act with reference to the character, size, and construction of rafts, and methods of towing shall not apply to those portions of the waters of Lake Superior bordered by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

So as to make the clause read:

For entering and navigating all harbors with narrow channels, all rivers navigated by vessels other than rafting tugs, except in the rivers St. Mary, St. Clair, Maumee, Detroit, and Niagara, said harbors or rivers being on or connecting with any of the Great Lakes, and for entering or passing through the Portage Lake Ship canals across Keweenaw Point, Michigan, logs shall be made into crib rafts, and be held together by frequent cross sticks, chains, or cables; and shall be handled by two tugs of sufficient power to properly control them. Each failure to comply with this restriction shall constitute an offense punishable as hereinafter provided for. The provisions and restrictions of this act with reference to the character, size, and construction of rafts, and methods of towing shall not apply to those portions of the waters of Lake Superior bordered by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 24, after the word "shall," to strike out "not exceed 600 feet in length and 60 feet in width; they shall;" and on page 70, line 4, after the words "move it," to insert "as far as possible;" so as to make the clause read:

On the St. Marys River between Sault Ste. Marie and the head of Mud Lake, at a point 2 miles below the position of the Encampment Crib light, rafts shall be securely fastened by cross-ties, or otherwise, to preserve, as far as possible, a uniform width; each raft shall be handled by not less than two tugs of sufficient power to keep the raft under control and to move it as far as possible to one side of the channel sufficiently to permit vessels to pass; and each failure to comply with this restriction shall constitute an offense punishable as hereinafter provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 8, after the words "Saint Clair," to strike out "and" and insert "Maumee;" in line 9, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty-two;" and in line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

On the St. Clair, Maumee, Detroit, and Niagara rivers, rafts shall not exceed in length 2,300 feet, nor in width 200 feet; they shall be securely crosstied to preserve uniform width; and each failure to comply with this restriction shall constitute an offense punishable as hereinafter provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, on page 76, line 20, after the word "bridges," to strike out:

Promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of vessels and boats, and it is hereby declared to be unlawful to obstruct, hinder, or unreasonably delay the passage of vessels and boats through the draws of such bridges.

And insert:

Under such rules and regulations as in the opinion of the Secretary of War the public interests require to govern the opening of drawbridges for the passage of vessels and other water crafts, and such rules and regulations, when so made and published, shall have the force of law.

On page 77, line 4, before the word "open," to strike out "so," and in line 8, after the word "given," to insert "as provided in such regulation;" so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of all persons owning, operating, and tending the drawbridges now built, or which may hereafter be built across the navigable rivers and other waters of the United States, to open, or cause to be opened, the draws of such bridges, under such rules and regulations as in the opinion of the Secretary of War the public interests require to govern the opening of drawbridges for the passage of vessels and other water crafts, and such rules and regulations, when so made and published, shall have the force of law. Every such person who shall willfully fail or refuse to open, or cause to be opened, the draw of any such bridge for the passage of a boat or boats, or who shall unreasonably delay the opening of said draw after reasonable signal shall have been given, as provided in such regulations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000 nor less than $1,000, or by imprisonment (in the case of a natural person) for not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, on page 78, line 5, after the word "harbor," to insert "or river;" so as to read:

That it shall not be lawful to place, discharge, or deposit, by any process or in any manner, ballast, refuse, dirt, ashes, cinders, mud, sand, dredgings, sludge, acid, or any other matter of any kind other than that flowing from streets, sewers, and passing therefrom in a liquid state, in the waters of any harbor or river of the United States, for the improvement of which money has been appropriated by Congress, elsewhere than within the limits defined and permitted by the Secretary of War, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Let me call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the end of section 5. Does he need that provision, as it has been put in in better form in the earlier part of the bill? The Senator will find it is the same provision, and has been put in in better form in a preceding section.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the additional proviso go out.

Mr. RANSOM. All right.

Mr. DOLPH. At the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, I move to strike out the additional proviso, and if it shall be found necessary in conference it can be retained. However, I think it should go out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 6, page 78, line 18, after the words "United States," strike out down to and including the word "provided," in line 24, in the following words:

Provided further, That whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the public interests require it, he may make rules and regulations to govern the opening of drawbridges for the passage of vessels and other water crafts, and such rules and regulations, when so made and published, shall have the force of law, and any violation thereof shall be punished as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. SQUIRE. After conference with the chairman of the committee, I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 21, page 91.

From Hood's Canal to Puget Sound to North Bay, in said sound, with a view of constructing a water way and channel between the two bodies of water at the most practicable place of sufficient depth to be navigable for all classes of vessels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That verbal change will be made, in the absence of objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 12, page 97, after line 10, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 17, on page 98.

Mr. DOLPH. After consulting with the members of the committee who are present, we are satisfied that the amount appropriated there will be entirely inadequate, and even the amendment that I propose will be inadequate. I move, in line 17, section 13, to strike out "twenty-five," and insert "fifty;" so as to make the appropriation $150,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 13, line 17, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five," and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

For preliminary examinations, surveys, except where otherwise herein especially provided for, contingencies, expenses connected with inspection of bridges, the service of notice required in such cases, the examination of bridge sites and reports thereon, and for incidental repairs for which there is no special appropriation for rivers and harbors, $150,000, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. VILAS. I move to amend, on page 23, line 6, before the word "thousand," by striking out "three," and inserting "six;" so as to make the amount $6,000.

I have submitted that proposal to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and I think it has his approbation. It consists simply of increasing the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Two Rivers from $3,000 to $6,000. That harbor is one of growing importance. Within two years the business there has increased more than $2,000,000; and the harbor has been somewhat neglected. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 6, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert "six;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Two Rivers, Wis.: Continuing improvement, $6,000.

Mr. RANSOM. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. On page 21, in line 22, I move to amend before the word "thousand," by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "twenty." That is, so as to make the appropriation for improving the harbor at Kewaunee $20,000 instead of $15,000.

By some means the appropriation has fallen below even the usual allowance given by the committee of one-quarter of the estimate. The Chief of Engineers says that the amount that can be profitably expended there during the current fiscal year, which has recently begun, is $75,000 on that improvement; and yet not even the ordinary amount has been appropriated, but less than that.

Let me state what is mentioned in the report of the Chief Engineer himself, that with the recent completion of the railroad to that harbor it has become one end of a ferry across Lake Michigan, which has greatly increased its importance, and there is now a line of boats which transport cars and cargoes of cars in connection with the railroads on each side of the lake.

I hope there will be no question about the amendment. I understand the chairman agrees to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 22, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Kewaunee, Wis.: Continuing improvement, $20,000

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend in section 12, which provides for surveys, under the head of "Connecticut," on page 93, after line 21, by inserting:

Stonington Harbor.

Mr. RANSOM. There is no objection to that.

Mr. PLATT. I think this provision is not necessary, but if it is not it can be stricken out in conference.

Mr. RANSOM. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. On page 66, after line 16, I submit an amendment, which I send to the desk. I wish to state that the report from the Secretary of War as to Everett Harbor was received the day after the report on the bill had been made by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 66, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

For dredging Everett Harbor, including mouth of Snohomish River, and Snohomish River from mouth to Lowell, in the State of Washington, the sum of $25,000.

Mr. RANSOM. I have tried to make this a fair bill. An appropriation of $25,000 at that point would not be in keeping with other appropriations in the bill. I suggest to the Senator from Washington to make the sum $10,000, and then I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. SQUIRE. I accept that suggestion, and will modify the amendment by making the amount $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. On page 16, line 15, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "eighty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety," so as to make the appropriation $90,000.

At the mouth of the Calcasieu River, in Louisiana, there are two bars, one where the stream empties into the Gulf of Mexico, and the other above that, where the upper stream empties into what is called Lake Calcasieu. Further up the Calcasieu River is the town of Lake Charles, in Southwestern Louisiana, and is that section of the State where a large number of immigrants from the Northwestern States have recently settled. There are a number of sawmills on the lake at the town of Lake Charles.

This project for the deepening of this bar at the mouth of the Calcasieu River has been going on for some years. It is a most worthy improvement, and when accomplished will enable vessels to carry cargoes of lumber from the lumber mills on the Calcasieu River to Mexico and other Central American States. The engineer reports that it would require $425,000 to complete the work. He further states that the work consists of jetties, which extend a considerable distance out into the Gulf of Mexico. It is important that that character of work should be completed rapidly, because if left exposed to storms it deteriorates and the the jetties are washed away.

This matter was brought by me to the attention of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate for an appropriation of $20,000 additional to the sum allowed by the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. I now ask that one-half of that sum, or $10,000, be allowed at this time; and I hope that my friend from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, will do me the favor to agree to this amendment. It is an important project, and the money will be well expended in the achievement of results.

Mr. RANSOM. I can not refuse that request. I see how a gentleman's ideas and views enlarge upon coming from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and I should be a very silly man to object to it. I agree to the amendment so far as I may.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated at the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, in line 15, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "eighty" and insert "ninety;" so as to read:

Improving mouth and passes of Calcasieu River, Louisiana: Continuing improvement, $90,000, of which $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used on the inner bars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. On page 14, in line 23, after the word "Florida," I move to strike out down to and including the word "harbor," in line 3, on page 15; and in lieu thereof to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 23, after the word "Florida," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including the word "harbor," in line 3, on page 15, as follows:

Continuing improvement, $125,000; and the Secretary of War may, if he deems it advisable, begin the improvement recommended by the Board of Engineers appointed in January, 1891, to consider and report upon the improvement of said harbor.

And insert:

The Secretary of War shall enter into contract with the lowest responsible and most efficient bidder for the permanent improvement of the harbor at Pensacola, Fla., according to the plan and estimate of the Board of Engineers under the act of 1891, to obtain a depth of 30 feet of water, at a cost not exceeding $500,000, of which amount $100,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from North Carolina in charge of the bill will agree to the amendment I have offered. The appropriation for this item in the bill is $125,000 for continuing the improvement according to the former estimate. The amendment I propose reduces the present appropriation, and requires the improvement to be made according to the later plan and estimate of the Board of Engineers under the act of 1891, authorizing a contract to be made not exceeding $500,000 for the full amount, and appropriating $100,000 for the work at this time.

The harbors on the coast of Florida, which comprises a large portion of the coast of the United States, including the harbors of the Gulf coast, Pensacola, Tampa Bay, and Charlotte are capable of being made at a slight expense deep-water harbors. The commerce with the Central and South American States finds in those ports its outlet and its inlet; which are capable of being made adequate to the largest vessels.

Inasmuch as this appropriation reduces the amount contained in the bill and only provides for the contract for the work, I think there ought to be no objection to it, and I hope the Senator from North Carolina will agree to it.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I dislike very much to oppose anything which my friend from Florida wishes, but I think the Senate should know the condition of this matter.

The Senators from Florida were before the committee and advocated placing Fernandina Harbor under the contract system. The committee did that, cutting down the appropriation $75,000, putting the work at that harbor under the contract system. The committee understood that the improvement at Fernandina was more important than the improvement mentioned in the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Florida. The committee made provision for the speedy completion of the more important improvement.

I do not think that anyone pressed the consideration of the Fernandina appropriation upon the committee, except the Senators from Florida. That harbor is partly in Florida, and I understand is one of the most important harbors of that State. The committee did not exactly see how, when there were, I think, only four improvements in this bill which were put under the contract system, that after we put Fernandina under that system we should also include this harbor.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not think my friend, the Senator from Oregon, ought to object to this appropriation for Pensacola or for any other appropriation in Florida. In this bill we have voted, and I have voted and am prepared to vote again, for an appropriation of $2,000,000 for an improvement in the State of Oregon on the Columbia River for prospective commerce, where there is none, and for the purpose of inducing it.

Now, we are here asking for an appropriation for a port which annually exports from and imports into the United States several million dollars of gold values. There is a large trade in lumber with the South American countries, and there is a commerce which benefits the whole country; and this point is the natural outlet for it. We are not asking for anything to induce future development; but we are asking for the preservation of existing commerce.

Here is a port where, with an appropriation of $500,000, it is proposed to secure 30 feet of water. If it can not be done under the proposed amendment, the Chief of Engineers will not make the contract. I propose to reduce the annual appropriation and thereby institute an economy. This appropriation will save to the people of the United States as well as to the Government of the United States five times the amount which is now annually appropriated. It reduces the appropriation for this year $25,000.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Florida about the economy of the contract system, and I think that every great improvement should be conducted in that way. What I suggested was that I did not see how the committee could agree to put so much important work under the contract system for one State, when there were so few improvements so treated in the bill.

In regard to the Columbia River, the Senator from Florida does not know anything about that river, I judge. There are more of the products of the soil of Oregon go out of the mouth of the Columbia River every year than are raised in the whole State of Florida. We have 122 miles of river between Portland and the sea, up which come the vessels of all the maritime nations of the earth, and there may be seen in Portland Harbor at any time the flags of nearly all nations. The people of the city of Portland have expended nearly $500,000 on that stretch of the river within the last two years; they have constructed 8 miles of training dike and have expended many thousands of dollars in dredging so as to make a 25-foot channel.

The engineer in charge reported that it only required $153,000 to complete the work, and still the House of Representatives gave only $35,000 for that 122 miles of navigable river, and it was only increased by the Senate committee to $50,000.

In regard to the upper river, which I presume the Senator had in mind, thirty-two years ago I went down that river from Wallula on a boat carrying from 400 to 600 tons of freight, and from fifty to one hundred passengers, and the river was navigated 200 miles above The Dalles Rapids by a fleet of boats long before railroads were built.

These improvements are not for a prospective commerce; they are for existing commerce. The valley of the Columbia, which is drained by that river and the cost of marketing the products of which would be affected by the improvement of that river, is in extent larger than New England and New York.

As I said, I reluctantly make any opposition to the wishes of the Senator from Florida, and I shall say nothing more. I shall let the chairman of the committee say what shall be done with the amendment.

I entirely agree with the Senator from Florida that the contract system is the economical system and that all the great works of this country ought to be conducted under it: but the question now is what we should do in this bill.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I find in this bill the following:

Improving Columbia River, Oregon and Washington, at Three-Mile Rapids, and the construction and equipment of a boat railway from the foot of The Dalles Rapids to the head of Celilo Falls, etc.

With an appropriation of $2,014,467. Will the Senator from Oregon pretend to say that there is any commerce there where this boat railway is to be made?

Mr. DOLPH. Not on those particular rapids, but above and below on the river there has been commerce for years.

Mr. CALL. That is what I said, and the Senator dodged the question.

Mr. DOLPH. Oh, no.

Mr. CALL. There was nothing said about the commerce of the mouth of the river; but I was comparing this bill with nearly $3,000,000 which we are voting for prospective commerce in Oregon, with the objection to a contract for $500,000 for the port of Pensacola, 500 miles away from the port of Fernandina, which subserves the purposes of the people of the United States. This is not a bill for the State of Florida, though the sum I have named is an appropriation for the State of Oregon. This is an appropriation for the whole United States, and it saves to the Treasury of the United States at least a million dollars in these appropriations.

This contract being made for $500,000, reducing the annual appropriation by $25,000, will this year pay to the people of the United States more than twice the amount which will be expended under this amendment of mine.

So by comparison with this upwards of $2,000,000 for a boat railway away up on the Columbia River, where there is no commerce and where there are no people, but which is prospective and to induce commerce, there is nothing like the advantage to the country, and I say it does not lie in the mouth of the Senator from Oregon to make this objection.

The gulf coast of Florida covers a large part of the coast of the United States, commencing at Georgia and running around along the peninsula of Florida. On the Atlantic there are the ports of Jacksonville, Fernandina, Augustine, New Smyrna, Canaveral, Miami, Key West, Charlotte Harbor, Tampa, Apalachicola, St. Andrews, Pensacola, Cedar Keys, furnishing in Tampa, Charlotte Harbor, Apalachicola, and Carrabella and in Pensacola outlet to the whole of the commerce of the United States to South American countries, and a place for the shipping of the whole Gulf of Mexico to find its refuge and its place of safety.

So there is no question that those harbors and ports where there can be made deep water in the Gulf of Mexico and upon the Atlantic Ocean, are not matters which belong to the State, but are of the highest importance to the whole people of the United States.

For that reason I think there should be no objection to an amendment which reduces the appropriations in this bill, and at the same time accomplishes a work required for a far less amount; and when compared with other appropriations in this bill it is the most meritorious one that can be made.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I have nothing to say against the appropriations made for the State of Oregon, and I trust the amendment offered by my colleague is strong enough to stand upon its merits without any such attack.

The Senate committee has been liberal in making additions to the appropriations for Florida. We are very glad of the improvement of Cumberland Sound, in which our State is greatly interested, which has been put in this bill. Cumberland Sound is of vast importance, and contains the harbor of Fernandina, and one end of the jetties rests upon Amelia Island, where Fernandina is located. This improvement has been put upon the continuing list. I shall be very glad if anything I can say will strengthen the efforts of my colleague to put Pensacola also upon the continuing list.

I wish to give to the Senate some of the commercial statistics of the port of Pensacola, taken from the recent report of the Chief of Engineers.

The following statement of the business of the port of Pensacola, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, has been furnished by the collector of customs:

Lumber exported.....feet b. m..	336,995,000
Value of exports to foreign ports	$3,805,967
Value of exports to coastwise ports	468,705
Total exports	4,274,672
Value of imports from foreign ports	6,517,581
Total exports and imports	10,792,253
Duties on imports and miscellaneous collections	27,938
Vessels entering and clearing.
Vessels entering from foreign ports	460
Vessels entering from coastwise ports	89
Total entering	549
Vessels clearing for foreign ports	479
Vessels clearing for coastwise ports	86
Total clearing	565
Vessels employed in traffic of port	168

It is well known that Pensacola is the best harbor upon the Gulf of Mexico, and it is well worthy of being placed upon the continuing list. It is very desirable that the obstructions to commerce there should be removed, and I should be very glad if the Senate would adopt the amendment offered by my colleague, and add Pensacola to the places included in the system of continuing improvements.

Mr. RANSOM. It would be a real gratification to me to accedt to the wishes of the Senators from Florida. I know the imporeance of this port, and the Senate knows it, but if the Senators from Florida will think with me for one second, as I know the Senate will, they will realize that they ought not to insist upon this amendment. In the first place, the Senate Committee on Commerce has increased the House appropriation for Pensacola

$25,000, one-fourth, showing our disposition to help that port. Now, the Senate has not thought about it, but we have just put Fernandina on the permanent appropriation list. There is no more important port in Florida than Fernandina, and the Senators from Florida would not discriminate between Fernandina and Pensacola. They fought for both and insisted upon both.

But the committee in its discretion, and it was a wise discretion, determined to put Fernandina on the permanent appropriation list and then increased the appropriation for Pensacola $25,000. That ought to be satisfactory. It is fair; it is just.

I certainly do not underate the commercial importance of the State of Florida, its length of coast, and what it is to be in the future. I know of the great phosphate beds there, which are to furnish fertilizing material not only to the United States, but perhaps to Europe. I know of the exhaustless resources they have. I know of their large forests. I know what progress has taken place there, but they have now a permanent, continuing improvement at Jacksonville, on the St. Johns River.

Is not that so? The committee in this very bill has provided for a permanent continuing improvement for Fernandina, and we give in this bill $25,000 more for Pensacola than the other House gave. I appeal to my friends from the State of Florida; I know their earnestness for their State——

Mr. CALL. Take off the $25,000.

Mr. RANSOM. Let it stay; but we can not make every place in the United States a continuing, permanent improvement. If we were to do so, the bill would be crowded to death. It could not last. Next year's sundry civil appropriation bill would almost sink the country. I can not agree to the amendment. I will have to object to it. But if the Senators from Florida will think of it, they will see that they are treated fairly in the bill. I hope the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] will not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. CALL. I shall not oppose the passage of the bill by calling for a vote; but I have some other amendments to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair). Does the Chair understand the Senator from Florida to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the Senator does.

Mr. CALL. I desire to offer another amendment. We can not have a vote on this amendment without delaying the passage of the bill, and as the Senator will not agree to it, I withdraw it.

Mr. RANSOM. I would agree to it if I could, but I can not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CALL. On page 15, line 9, I move to strike out the word "twenty" and insert the words "one hundred."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, page 15, strike out "twenty" and insert "one hundred;" so as to read:

Improving Charlotte Harbor and Pease Creek, Florida: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. CALL. It is my duty to present the facts in this case and the reasons which should influence this appropriation. It is not, as stated by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from North Carolina, that it should be confined to a State and a State's interest, but that it should represent the interest of the commerce of the people of the United States.

The ports of Charlotte Harbor export large quantities of phosphate rock. It needs this improvement in order to reduce the cost of shipment to the people who produce that rock. A large trade exists with Europe to-day, and an appropriation of $100,000 will save $500,000 this year to the commerce of the United States. That is the statement of this case. This appears from the report of the engineers, and upon that ground I ask the Senator from North Carolina to accept the amendment.

Mr. RANSOM. Everybody knows that I wish I could accept the amendment, but the engineers say that only $50,000 could possibly be used in the year.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the whole contract be authorized for $100,000.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senate doubled the House appropriation, and here the engineers say that all that possibly can be used during the year, if they had all the money in the world, is $50,000. I can not accept the amendment.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from North Carolina is like the Senator from Oregon. He will not stand up to the question.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, I will.

Mr. CALL. The question is whether you are willing to give a hundred thousand dollars, and, if you choose, to authorize a permanent contract for the improvement, so as to secure deep water at that harbor, or whether you are willing to appropriate $20,000 only, a wholly inadequate sum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I will give the Senator from North Carolina another opportunity. I propose on page 15, after line 9, to insert:

Improvement of harbor at Cape Canaveral, Florida, so as to make a harbor of refuge for vessels requiring deep water, and for the proctection of the light-house, $20,000; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to contract for the improvement of the harbor at a cost not exceeding $100,000, of which amount $20,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. DOLPH. This is an entirely new item. I do not remember now whether it was considered by the Committee on Commerce. I do not think it was.

Mr. CALL. It is recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH. Was the amendment ever sent to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. CALL. It was.

Mr. DOLPH. Under the circumstances, without consulting with the other members of the committee, we can not accept the amendment.

Mr. CALL. The amendment was referred to the Committee on Commerce. If they did not consider it that is another matter.

Mr. DOLPH. We considered such as our attention was called to by Senators.

Mr. CALL. The amendment was printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It has been recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. That is a very important point for the commerce of the whole United States passing along the coast of Florida. It is the most easterly point upon the coast. All the commerce of the Gulf passes in sight. In case of storm they find an easy place of refuge. It has been submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs as a proper improvement for the Navy of the United States as well as for the commercial marine as a place where vessels can find refuge. For that reason I bring it to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 2, line 17, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read "$15,000."

I will say that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce agrees to have the amendment go into the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 17, before the word "thousand," strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor of refuge at Little Harbor, New Hampshire: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO. I desire to offer an amendment, which has been submitted to the chairman of the committee, and I believe it will meet with his approval.

The SECRETARY. On page 93, after line 25, insert:

St. John's River from Jacksonville to the ocean: The Secretary of War is hereby directed to prepare and submit plans and estimates for continuing the work, so as to secure an increase of the depth of the channel to 24 feet.

Mr. RANSOM. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I move to add to the amendment of my colleague relative to the survey of the St. John's River:

And for the improvement of the channel of the St. John's River, Florida, to Sanford and above that point, so as to make deep-water navigation for seagoing vessels to Sanford, Fla.

Mr. DOLPH. I suggest to the Senator that he use the words "with a view to obtaining navigation for deep-water vessels." That is the usual language as to surveys.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

Mr. PASCO. I ask my colleague whether this is a new amendment, or is intended to be added to the one I have offered?

Mr. CALL. It is proposed to be added to the amendment of my colleague, because his amendment relates to that river.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest that this be offered as a new amendment, and that the suggestion to modify the amendment by changing the phraseology be accepted. If my colleague will permit me, I will have the amendment read in its modified shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 93, after line 25, insert:

St. John's River from Jacksonville to the ocean: The Secretary of War is hereby directed to prepare and submit plans and estimates for continuing the work, with a view to secure an increase of the depth of the channel to 24 feet.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Florida did not exactly catch my meaning. What I suggested was that it was unusual in the matter of surveys to direct the Secretary of War to prepare plans. That naturally follows. I suggest that the amendment provide for a survey of the river between certain points, with a view to securing navigation of a certain depth; and all the balance follows.

Mr. PASCO. I followed the very language that is made use of with reference to a Georgia project.

Mr. DOLPH. In the bill as it came from the other House. We did not choose to disturb that in the Senate.

Mr. PASCO. I think the same language had better be followed.

Mr. CALL. I will submit the amendment which I propose.

Mr. PASCO. I understand the project my colleague refers to is a different one, and relates to the river above Jacksonville.

Mr. CALL. Yes; above Jacksonville.

Mr. PASCO. The amendment I have offered has already been adopted.

Mr. CALL. Yes; then I will offer this as an independent amendment, to be inserted after line 5, on page 83.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 5, on page 83, insert:

For the improvement of the channel of the St. Johns River to Sanford and points above, with a view to obtaining sufficient water for seagoing vessels.

Mr. RANSOM. I agree to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Then I will move further, to add to the provision made in the bill for the improvement of Charlotte Harbor and Pease Creek, the words "and Punta Rassa;" and when this amendment is agreed to I will again move for an increased amount adequate to both.

Mr. DOLPH. What point is Punta Rassa?

Mr. CALL. Punta Rassa is a point in the waters of the bay of Charlotte Harbor, farther south, where there is the entrance of the Caloosahatchie River, which connects with Lake Okeechobee and the drainage system that has been designed by the State of Florida, running up into the interior.

Mr. DOLPH. It is a new scheme. Has there been any examination or survey or report?

Mr. CALL. There has been an appropriation every year for the Caloosahatchie River. The Senator will find it in the old appropriation acts. Punta Rassa is at the mouth of the Caloosahatchie River. The Senator will find the whole of that project covered in the surveys. It is one of the most valuable tropical parts of Florida. I ask that the improvement at Punta Rassa be included in the appropriation for Charlotte Harbor. The proposed appropriation, $20,000, is, however, entirely inadequate for the needs of Charlotte Harbor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

Mr. CALL. At the suggestion of my colleague, I move to insert the amendment on page 39, after the word "river" in line 6.

The SECRETARY. After the word "river" in line 6, page 39, insert "at Punta Rassa;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Caloosahatchee River and the entrance to the river at Punta Rassa, Fla.: For $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Then at the suggestion of my colleague I move to strike out the word "one" in the same clause and insert "two;" so as to read "$2,000."

Mr. RANSOM. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President, I move——

Mr. RANSOM. I shall object. I give the Senator from Florida fair notice.

Mr. CALL. I am going to ask a very small thing of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. No; I will not agree to it.

Mr. CALL. I am going to ask the Senator to insert after line 9, on page 15, Clear Water Harbor and Anclote Harbor, and to give each one of them $1,000. I will state to the Senator that these are two places where there is a great congregation of sponge vessels and fishing vessels. Vessels from the Gulf of Mexico and sailing yachts which sail from the Eastern ports into the Gulf during the winter enter these harbors.

There is a large commerce there. At times you will find behind the islands, outside of these harbors, one, two, and three hundred little vessels, which furnish fish and sponges to the interior of North Carolina, and, in fact, the whole United States. There is a large export of sponges to foreign countries, and I ask for only $1,000 for each of these places.

Mr. PASCO. I call my colleague's attention to the fact that Anclote Harbor has been put in with the list of preliminary surveys on page 83.

Mr. CALL. I know it has been, and I desire that it should be; but it has been surveyed and estimated for, and the increase of commerce at Anclote justifies the appropriation at this time.

Mr. RANSOM. I have done everything in the world for the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. The Senator will not give us anything more?

Mr. RANSOM. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Florida to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir. The Senator from North Carolina will not agree to it; but I give notice that I shall seek the first opportunity to renew the effort to accomplish these objects, and to add to them the improvement of the Miami and Fort Jupiter entrance, and to place Indian River, which is really an estuary of the Atlantic Ocean, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, under the care and the control of the National Government for the improvement of its navigation, and also the Ocklawaha River from the St. Johns to Leesburg and the lakes beyond.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. RANSOM, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. DOLPH were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6373) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OUTHWAITE, Mr. LAPHAM, and Mr. HULL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1919) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Yuma Indians in California, for the cession of their surplus lands, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4209) for the relief of the securities of John S. Bradford;

A bill (H. R. 4734) to authorize the Secretary of State to accept for the United States of America a painting by G. F. Watts, Royal Academy, entitled "Love and Life;"

A bill (H. R. 5525) authorizing John E. Johnson and others to accept medals of honor and diplomas from the Government of Spain;

A bill (H. R. 6424) to authorize Rear-Admiral John G. Walker and Surg. Gen. J. Rufus Tryon, of the United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the "Busto del Libertador" of the third class from the President of Venezuela;

A bill (H. R. 6468) to amend section 1674 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to consular officers;

A bill (H. R. 7475) authorizing Commander C. H. Davis, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of Spain; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 126) authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the meetings of the International Geodetic Association.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6373) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and accede to the request of the House of Representatives for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. COCKRELL, and Mr. TELLER were appointed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7097, being the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7097) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent that we may act upon the amendments of the committee as we proceed with the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that course will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, line 11, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the salaries of Senators elected or appointed to fill vacancies in the Senate and of Senators elected for a full term subsequent to the commencement of such term, shall commence on the date of their election or appointment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do I understand that the compensation is to begin before the term commences at the time of election?

Mr. COCKRELL. To be perfectly frank with the Senator from Ohio I will state that there has been a construction to the effect that the terms begin at certain times regardless of the fact whether they are filled or not. There are three classes of Senators. On the 3d of March, 1893, there was a vacancy in a class of Senators. That vacancy has not been filled to-day, and will not be filled until next winter.

It will then be filled, and under the old construction of the law the gentleman who will then be elected and become for the first time a Senator will be entitled to draw pay to the amount of $10,000 for a period when he never dreamed of being Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe that was a faulty construction, but I do not propose to act as a reformer. The point I make is as to the language as it now stands in the amendment. Take my own case. A Senator from the State of Ohio is always elected fourteen months before his term commences. This language is very clear, and undoubtedly I would be entitled if elected Senator to compensation from the time of my election. It would give me pay for a year and two months before I could possibly take the seat.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. It can not be construed that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I will read it:

The compensation of Senators, $440,000: Provided, That the salaries of Senators elected or appointed to fill vacancies in the Senate and of Senators elected for a full term subsequent to the commencement of such term, shall commence on the date of their election or appointment.

In my judgment that language would clearly give to a Senator compensation from the date of his election.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will just examine it carefully he will see that he misconstrues it entirely. It reads:

That the salaries of Senators elected or appointed to fill vacancies in the Senate, and of Senators elected for a full term subsequent to the commencement of such term.

That is the only class of Senators it applies to, those appointed or elected subsequent to the commencement of the term. It does not refer to or touch anybody else, and the Senator sees that he has not applied the word "subsequent" to the right part of the sentence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt very much whether the language will bear out the meaning, but if it does, why should a Senator receive compensation before the date of his election?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is exactly what we are trying to stop. Three Senators will be elected next winter for the term beginning March 4, 1893, from three States of this Union, and we are trying to stop them from taking $30,000 out of the Treasury without any possible title to it, which they will do unless we make this provision of law, because they will not be elected until two years after their terms begin.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly sympathize with the object the Senator has in view, because no man ought to receive compensation for the time before his election, but I question very much whether the language as it now stands is not susceptible of a double meaning.

Mr. COCKRELL. It can not be. It reads:

That the salaries of Senators elected or appointed to—

to fill vacancies in the Senate and of Senators elected for a full term subsequent to the commencement of such term.

It does not have anything to do with Senators elected for a term to begin on a date in the future. It does not relate to that matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am inclined to think that the language requires a little careful consideration. I shall not make any point upon it, but in conference it certainly ought to be made clear.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventeen thousand two hundred and fifty-eight" and insert "twenty-three thousand four hundred and ninety-eight;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, $423,498.90, namely.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 9, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-three" and insert "twenty-nine," and in line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-three thousand one hundred and twenty" and insert "forty-one thousand seven hundred and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

For twenty-nine clerks to committees, at $1,440 each, $41,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 18, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And $500 additional while the office of assistant doorkeeper is held by Isaac Bassett.

So as to read:

Office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper: For Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, $4,500; horse and wagon for his use, $420, or so much thereof as may be necessary; for clerk to Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000; assistant doorkeeper, $2,592, and $500 additional while the office of assistant doorkeeper is held by Isaac Bassett.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, in line 23, to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "thirty-six;" so as to read:

Thirty-six messengers, at $1,440 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, line 17, to increase the total appropriation for the office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate from $114,584 to $115,084.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 6, line 17, I move to change the total, so as to read:

One hundred and fifteen thousand eight hundred and four dollars.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 15, on page 7.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "nine" in line 13; so as to read:

And nine folders at $720 each.

And change the total appropriation for the folding room from $22,330 to $21,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. So as to make the clause read:

For thirty-three annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of Committees, at $1,200 each: Provided, That Senators elected, whose term of office begins on the 4th day of March, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "six," and in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "seventeen;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses, namely: For stationery and newspapers, including $6,000 for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate, $17,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of maintaining and equipping horses and mail wagons for carrying the mails, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three," and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of furniture, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 6, after the word "cleaning," to insert "repairing;" so as to make the clause read:

For services in cleaning, repairing, and varnishing furniture, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 12, before the word "dollars," to insert "nine hundred and forty;" so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous items on account of the Maltby Building, $16,940.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and five," and insert "seventy-three thousand three hundred and twenty-nine;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the House of Representatives, $373,329.74, namely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to increase the amount so as to read "$374,655.74." That is a change which makes the correct total and it is necessary to be made. Strike out "three" and insert "four," strike out "three" again and insert "six," strike out "twenty-nine" and insert "fifty-five;" so as to read "$374,655.74."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 11, line 11.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 7, after the word "office," I move to insert the letter "r" so as to read "officer." It is "disbursing office," but it is evidently intended for "disbursing officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 12, line 13.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 4, page 12, I move to strike out "and" after the word "clerk" and insert "$1,200;" so as to read:

One assistant to the file clerk, $1,200.

In line 12, after the word "thousand," I move to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so as to read:

In all, $86,528.

I move this amendment at the special request of the House of Representatives. It is their matter, and they have requested it. It is not done because we are interfering with their arrangements, but solely because they request it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 13, line 20, before the word "and," to strike out "sixteen thousand" and insert "fifteen thousand nine hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For twenty-two clerks to committees, including a clerk to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, at $6 each per day during the session, $15,972.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 17, page 13, I move to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "twenty-three;" so as to read:

For twenty-three clerks to committees.

I also move to change the total in line 19 to $16,698. This change is made because we have been advised by the other House that an additional clerk has been created there and it is a necessity.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 18, line 24, after the word "Library," to insert "under the direction of the Chief Justice," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of books for the library, $4,000; for purchase of law books for the library, under the direction of the Chief Justice, $1,500; for the purchase of new books of reference for the Supreme Court, to be a part of the Library of Congress, and purchased under the direction of the Chief Justice, $1,500; for expenses of exchanging public documents for the publications of foreign governments, $1,500; for purchase of files of periodicals, serials, and newspapers, $2,500; in all $11,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 8, to insert:

And in lieu of the clerks now detailed from the several executive departments for duty as examiners at the Civil Servic Commission, clerks for such duty to be employed by said Commission are hereby provided for as follows: Six clerks of class four; eight clerks of class three; ten clerks of class two; twelve clerks of class one; in all, $52,000: Provided, That the said Commission may transfer to its rolls and employ such of the clerks now detailed as may be deemed qualified for examining work.

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee how this provision affects the number of clerks employed, whether it is an addition to the clerks at present employed or a reduction, or whether it is the same number which are now employed?

Mr. COCKRELL. The number of clerks here specified are detailed from the different Departments.

Mr. PLATT. Thirty-six in all.

Mr. COCKRELL. We provide for them here, and strike them off in the Departments.

Mr. PLATT. They are stricken off in the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. They are stricken off in the bill from the Departments. There is no increase in the aggregate number.

Mr. PLATT. The Civil Service Commission is not obliged to employ them all, but can take the number they want. If they do not utilize them all, can they appoint new ones, so that there will be no reduction in the number of examiners?

Mr. COCKRELL. There are a few places now that are not filled by the details. The details are made, but the clerks are not being used, because it is said they are not fit for the duty. There will be authority for new clerks to be taken under civil service examinations or taken from the list of those already in the Departments.

Mr. PLATT. This does not take any of the clerks away from the commission?

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JARVIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 23, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of editing and distributing the laws enacted during the first and second sessions of the Fifty-third Congress and the Statutes at Large of the Fifty-third Congress, four thousand dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 12, after the word "dollar," to insert "stenographer, $1,800;" and in line 19, before the word "hundred," to strike out "thirty-seven thousand eight" and insert "thirty-nine thousand six;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000; three assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $4,500 each; clerk to the Secretary, $2,400; stenographer, $1,800; three private secretaries, one to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under the control of the Treasury Department, $1,800; one clerk of class one; one copyist; three messengers; three assistant messengers; in all, $39,680.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 17, on page 23, before the word "messenger," I move to strike out "three" and insert "four;" and in the same line, before the words "assistant messengers," I move to strike out "three" and insert "four."

The Treasury Department recommend four messengers and four assistant messengers, and I hold in my hand the letter of Secretary Carlisle, written to-day, in which he asks for the restoration. It does not increase the force, but, on the contrary, the proposed reform of the Treasury Department reduces the number of messengers eight, and this will still leave a reduction of six.

I ask that the Secretary's letter be printed in the RECORD in connection with this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 13, 1894.

SIR: Referring to my recent letter, in which I recommended an increase of one messenger and one assistant messenger in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, I have the honor to again urge the increase of force.

As at present constituted, the force of messengers and assistant messengers for that office consists of three each, all of whom are on duty with the three Assistant Secretaries, leaving the room of the Secretary to be provided for by details from other Bureaus.

Inasmuch as the proposed reorganization of force in this Department will reduce the messenger and laborer force by eight, it will cause embarrassment to provide the Secretary's office with such service from other offices.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. In order to conform to the amendments I have just proposed, I also move to strike out the total in line 18, and insert "$41,240."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 17, before the word "messengers," it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert "four;" in the same line, before the words "assistant messengers," to strike out "three" and insert "four," and after the word "all," in line 18, to strike out "$37,880" and insert "$41,240."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 11, on page 25.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who desires to submit some remarks upon the provisions relating to the reorganization of the Treasury Department, I will designate as we reach them all such provisions, and they may for the time being be passed over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that we pass over, beginning in line 12, on page 25, to the end of line 23, on page 42. The real question I wish to present to the Senate is found on page 126 and supra.

Mr. COCKRELL. When we reach the provisions in the reading of the bill that relate to the subject to which the Senator refers, I shall have them reserved.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to reserve the amendments on pages 31, 32, and 33.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is only one division of the Secretary's office that is changed. There is no use of reserving the others. I shall note the amendments as we reach them.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one on page 31.

Mr. COCKRELL. We may as well make the reservations at once, and be done with them. I propose to reserve from line 12, on page 25, down to and including line 23, on page 26.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator whether he expects to close the bill to-night?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to finish all of the bill but the part on which the Senator desires to be heard. Of course, I am not going to insist on the Senator's speaking this evening under the circumstances.

I propose to reserve also, beginning on page 31, line 5, down to and including line 23, on page 42; then I propose to reserve, beginning on page 45, with line 15, down to and including line 24, on page 46; and then, toward the close of the bill, beginning on page 126, at section 3, and going to the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks that the parts of the bill indicated by him may be reserved.

Mr. COCKRELL. Perhaps the reading of the parts of the bill to which I have referred had better be omitted at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it necessary to read the parts the Senator desires to have reserved. Let them all go over.

I desire to say, to relieve the Senator from any idea that I desire to prolong this matter, that I merely wish to present the very important question raised about the reorganization of the Treasury Department. I hope all Senators may be present to hear what may be said, because I do not wish to delay at all the passage of this important appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to reserving the parts of the bill which have been designated by the Senator from Missouri, and they will be so reserved. The reading of the bill will be resumed after the first reservation, beginning in line 24, on page 26.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 27, line 9, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "two;" in the same line, after the word "two," to insert "one clerk of class 1;" in line 10, after the word "one," to strike out "one clerk, at $1,000," and insert "three clerks, at $1,000 each;" in line 11, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" in line 12, after the word "each," to strike out "two copyists, at $840 each; one assistant messenger," and insert "two assistant messengers," and in line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six hundred and ten" and insert "five hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Division of appointments: For chief of division, $2,750; assistant chief of division, $2,000; one clerk of class 4; two clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2; one clerk of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; three clerks, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; and one laborer; in all, $21,550.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of that portion of the bill from line 5, on page 31, to the end of line 23, on page 42, will be omitted for the present, under the order which has been made.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 24, on page 42.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

And county and township officers shall be elected in the counties of said Territory which have been organized since the last election, the same as in the counties in said Territory. Each of said commissioners hereby provided for shall be paid for his services a sum not exceeding $10 a day for the time actually spent in making such apportionment.

Now let the clause be read as it will read if amended.

Each of said commissioners hereby provided for shall be paid for his services a sum not exceeding $10 a day for the time actually spent in making such apportionment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 71, after the amendment just agreed to, to insert:

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to the appropriation for the surveyor-general of the State of Washington. I have had communications from the surveyor-general in which he states that it is necessary to have a larger appropriation for the payment of clerks. He speaks of his own salary as well.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have gone to the very utmost in regard to the State of Washington. We have given all that was estimated for, and we can not possibly establish the precedent of letting individual officers come in after official estimates have been made and make their own individual estimates. We have been very liberal in giving the full amount which has been estimated for.

Mr. SQUIRE. Perhaps that is true, if I may be allowed one moment, in regard to the surveyors-general, that there should not be an exception made. I can realize the importance of that among the surveyors-general of all the States. For a Republican Senator to rise here in order to secure an increased salary for a Democrat now in the office of surveyor-general might seem somewhat anomalous. Yet I believe that the surveyor-general of the State of Washington should be paid at least $2,500 per year. I wish to make a brief statement. In the State of Washington we are doing a great deal of work in this direction. The office of the surveyor-general in that State is to-day the most important one of its kind in the United States.

As I can show by statistics here from that office, there is a large amount of land surveyed and a large amount of money obtained therefor. It is to the interest of the Government that there should be an adequate and proper service rendered there on the part of the clerks. It seems to me that that phase of the question may well engage the attention of the committee, and that the amount allowed for the service of clerks may properly be raised, so that the business can be done.

Let me read one paragraph from the letter of the surveyor-general. He makes an estimate of $13,300 for the salaries of clerks, and says:

The estimate of $100,400 for surveying public lands is submitted as necessary for the survey of lands that are settled upon and occupied in part by actual settlers. This office has now on file at this date petitions for surveys from settlers aggregating over 361,000. The estimate of $13,300 for salaries of clerks in office is submitted as actually necessary for the proper transaction of office work in connection with the public surveys, for the current work of the office, which is constantly increasing, and bringing up arrears of office work, and is intended to include salaries of chief clerk, chief draftsman, two assistant draftsmen, seven copyists, and one stenographer.

On account of the insufficiency of the force employed a great deal of work is in arrears which should be brought up to date at as early a day as possible.

The estimate of $2,000 for contingent expenses is submitted as necessary for the pay of messenger, rent of office, stationery, binding, field notes, and plats of survey of public lands and mining claims, additional office furniture, and other necessary incidental expenses.

Arrears of office work comprises furnishing the several local United States land offices in this State with "descriptive lists" of soil, timber, corners, etc., of every township surveyed, as required by section 2395, Revised Statutes; also bringing up the work of transcribing field notes and making plats of townships surveyed, so that returns of deputy surveyors may be sent from this office to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to be acted upon as soon after notes are turned in as possible.

Not to speak further now in regard to the estimates for contingent expenses, as these are not mentioned in this paragraph of the bill, I submit that it is right and fair toward the interests of the State of Washington, not simply with reference to the question of the salary of the surveyor-general, but in reference to the necessity of employing a sufficient force to turn out the work of the office, that the appropriation should be increased. Therefore I trust the chairman of the committee will not think it inopportune for me to call his attention to this matter.

I have just received these papers. I have not had an opportunity to submit them to him as he has been so closely engaged with his committee. I have tried to find a moment when I could see him and explain this matter. I wish he would make an exception in this case with reference to these employés and allow the amount to be increased. If he will not allow the full amount, $13,300, that is named in the letter of the surveyor-general, which I will submit to him, let us agree on some additional sum beyond the amount named in the bill. There is named here now $9,500 for clerical assistants. I ask the chairman if he is not willing to increase that amount. I will show him the letter of the surveyor-general.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under a Republican Administration, with a Republican surveyor-general, they got along comfortably with $1,500 less than we have given the Democratic surveyor-general in the pending bill. We have given the full amount of the estimate, and I do not see how it is possible to go beyond that. We have given $1,500 over the appropriation of last year.

Mr. SQUIRE. Let me say something about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Right here is $1,500 more than was appropriated last year, and a Democrat ought to get along with $1,500 more than his Republican predecessor had.

Mr. SQUIRE. Let me say that we have now, in my opinion, a very competent and efficient surveyor-general. Although he is a Democrat I recommended him, knowing that a Democrat would be appointed. He is a thorough business man, a civil engineer by profession, and has been engaged in matters of importance in the railway service and in other public service. He is a man of remarkable talent and ability. He is attending to the surveys of our State as well as they have ever been attended to, even by any Republican surveyor-general; but I believe there has been a lack of the necessary office help for the past few years, while we have been growing so rapidly.

I do not consider that the inadequacy of former appropriations is a sufficient reason for failing to supply the necessary force to do the work of the office now. We now have the figures from the surveyor-general, and I submit them to the chairman of the committee. I hope that if he is not willing to give the whole amount he will give a part of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not possibly consent to let an individual officer, one of ten or fifteen, make an estimate of what the necessities of his office are, and independent of the Secretary under whom he acts, come in here and secure action upon it. We can not do that. We have allowed every solitary dollar that was estimated and sent to us as an estimate for this office. Now, we can not go beyond that. We have not gone beyond it in any case.

Mr. SQUIRE. Have you come up to the estimate submitted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. COCKRELL. We have come up to every estimate here. We appropriated for clerk hire last year $8,500.

Mr. SQUIRE. But this year?

Mr. COCKRELL. This year we appropriated $9,500. Last year the aggregate appropriation was $10,500. Now we make it $11,500.

Mr. SQUIRE. Have you reached the limit?

Mr. COCKRELL. For incidental expenses, for rent of office, fuel, books, stationery, pay of messenger and other incidental expenses we have left the House provision in. We appropriate $1,200 when $2,000 was estimated. That is the only point where we have fallen below the estimate in incidental expenses.

Mr. SQUIRE. Why fall below the estimate for incidental expenses? Certainly you can conform to that. I submit this is a case where the United States is not giving something for nothing. The money coming in from the sales of these lands is indicative of the value of the function of these officials there and their subordinates.

In the State of Washington, as I remarked, we have done in recent times more work in surveying public lands than has been done in three or four other States in the same period of time that have each had as much or nearly as much money appropriated for the expenses of the offices of their surveyors-general as we had. There is no State in the Union that makes the showing as to the amount of public lands sold last year that the State of Washington does, and I submit we ought to have this additional amount.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from Washington had come before the Appropriations Committee and heard the Senators from Idaho, Montana, and other States tell their tales he would be ashamed of the plea he has made here. They made according to their statements a case so much stronger for a special increase that I do not think he would have asked for it.

Mr. SQUIRE. I received the facts and figures I now present only recently, and I have tried to confer with the chairman. I have before me a statement of the amount spent or contracted for surveying under all the various surveyors-general for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, taken from the Land Office report of 1893.

It is shown that there was spent in the State of Washington from the appropriation of $300,000 for survey of public lands the sum of $45,000. No other State spent so much money under that head. Then under the heading "From the $125,000 appropriation for surveys within the limits of railroad grants" the State of Washington spent $19,000. No other State equaled it except the State of California. Under the other heading, "Various appropriations for survey of Indian lands" the State of Washington expended $21,180.

No other State approached it except the State of South Dakota, which expended an equal amount. Under the heading "Receipts from mining claimants and other private sources," the State of Washington expended $3,492; making a total expenditure in the State of Washington of $88,672, and no other State in this entire list reaches near that sum. Several of the States do not expend a quarter of that amount. Some States expended absolutely nothing for surveys. One State expended $10,000; another a little over $13,000.

Now, I submit that this showing of the relative amount of work done is such as to entitle the office in the State of Washington to proper facilities for the transaction of the public business, so as to allow the settlers to have their lands surveyed and the business in connection therewith promptly transacted. We have had a great deal too much delay in the State of Washington. Hundreds and thousands of settlers have been delayed in having their surveys made, and the surveyors have been delayed about getting their money, waiting for months, causing in instances more than a year's delay in getting their money for surveys. I feel it to be a solemn duty to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate.

If the Senate sees fit to let it go by the board, all right, I have done my duty; but without reference to the question of paying the surveyor-general any more, I feel that certainly these clerks ought to be employed in sufficient numbers and suitably paid to have the work done, and the incidental expenses of the offices ought to be provided for.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will see that the surveyor-general of Washington makes a proper return to the Secretary of the Interior showing the necessity for his office and let the Secretary estimate it so that we can appropriate it. I sympathize as fully as the Senator does with those persons who are trying to get a home where the lands have not been surveyed or where the surveys have not been approved and paid for.

We are doing all we can; but we can not go beyond a certain limit, beyond the amount that is actually estimated. If we do, then we have got to hear every surveyor-general in the United States and let him determine for himself what shall be appropriated for his office. We must have some rule. If the surveyor-general in Washington will make a proper presentation this summer as to the necessities of his office doubtless he can get a recommendation for an increase and it will be given him at the next session.

Mr. SQUIRE. Does the Senator desire to have me understand, and through me the people of the State of Washington, that it is probable upon such representations as can be made through that office there will be a further provision made?

Mr. COCKRELL. If they can convince the Secretary of the Interior, under whose charge they are and by whose sanction they were appointed and hold their office, that they need more money, I have no doubt that Congress will give it very largely, if not to the full limit. We have given it here to the full limit, and we have increased it $1,000 over what it was last year.

Mr. SQUIRE. We had a very inadequate survey.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no doubt that an increase will be given if a proper presentation is made and it is properly recommended to us as an estimate.

Mr. SQUIRE. This is a small item of a thousand dollars. Two thousand or twenty-five hundred dollars more is very little for this Government to pay for the biggest land office in the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Every one of the items in this bill, amounting in the aggregate to $22,000,000, is a very small item.

Mr. SQUIRE. I beg leave to submit as a part of my remarks a list of the amounts spent or contracted for surveying by the different surveyors-general of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893.

I also beg leave to submit a statement concerning the surveyed and unsurveyed lands in various States, principally the new States.

Third, I submit an interesting statement as to gross and net receipts from sale of public lands in various States, principally new States, and, fourth, I submit a comparative statement of population in the same States in 1890, also the population in the same occupying farms, or towns containing less than 5,000 people.

Mr. President, the figures above are very instructive, especially as to the progress and needs of the people of Washington as to surveys and settlement of the public lands. I forbear further comment at this time, excepting to say it seems to me that it is too close cheese paring to keep these people down in their efforts to settle the Western country. It is a small business for us to engage in to try to keep these people back in their occupation and settlement of these lands by not having them properly surveyed beforehand, so that the people who go on the lands can occupy them with some better and higher title than that of a mere squatter. We have hundreds and thousands of people who are regarded simply as squatters waiting for a survey of their lands. Why should the Government of the United States keep back these settlers?

Why should it not allow these lands to be surveyed? We have an efficient man in the office of surveyor-general. What he wants is clerks. What he wants besides money to pay for surveys is money to pay clerks so that the office may do its business properly and promptly. I trust the chairman of the committee will grant this increase, although we have not gone through all the detail and have not been able to shape the thing up to his committee through the Interior Department.

I was not aware of the condition of things until recently. Having received these papers, I deemed it my duty to present them to the Senate and to the chairman; and it seems to me he can not very well resist this honest and decent appeal on the part of the people of that State for relief under the circumstances. If there is too much money appropriated and it is ascertained in the end that it is not necessary, this amount will go over. It is not to be expended unless necessary. Why can not the amount be appropriated so that if needed it can be used? Nobody is going to squander any money there.

Mr. COCKRELL. Nobody ever squanders money there. It would only be an increase of salary there; that would be all.

Mr. SQUIRE. There is no chance under the efficient Commissioner of the General Land Office for any money to be squandered there. Every penny of it will be accounted for through this careful officer. I appeal in behalf of my people to the Senator to allow this amount to be increased for clerk hire and incidental expenses.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not possibly do it, and it is perfectly unreasonable for the Senator to ask it. I beg to say to him that we can not go beyond the estimate, and if the Senator were in my place he would scorn to do it. We can not do just as we please. We have a Department here that is in charge of this work. They make an estimate of the money that is required.

We give it to them. Then, when some man who has to spend that money and distribute it out to the employés under him comes in and says he wants more, could the Senator, if he were on the Appropriation Committee, recommend an increase in such a case?

Mr. SQUIRE. I would if there were a good showing. If there were an honest, fair showing I would do it. The Congress of the United States and the President are the authorities to decide what is right in legislation. The Bureau or Department is only executive or advisory.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not do it.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 110, line 5, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

For rent of office for the surveyor-general, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for the office of First Assistant Postmaster-General, on page 111, line 21, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eleven" and insert "ten," and on page 112, line 2, before the word "hundred," to strike out "sixty-four thousand three" and insert "sixty-two thousand nine;" so as to read:

Ten clerks of class 2; twenty-four clerks of class 1; five clerks, at $1,000 each; fifty-six clerks, at $900 each; six female clerks, at $720 each; one assistant messenger; three laborers; four female laborers, at $480 each; in all, $262,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] desires to call attention to an item on page 106.

Mr. WHITE. It is found in lines 20 and 21, on page 106. I will state that I am very familiar with the office of surveyor-general of California. The amount of money I think recommended for the item of books, stationery, pay of messenger, and other incidental expenses, was $2,000. The other House have made it $1,500. I am in position personally to know that that amount of money is insufficient. The office is being run parsimoniously as it is. I know that the officers who have made the estimates have placed them upon the lowest possible basis.

I would not interrupt the progress of the bill or make the suggestion unless I knew something about it. In fact the appropriation last year was so small that the Department refuses to allow cold water to be kept for the uses of the clerks, and I may add that it did not provide any substitute therefor. Besides, there is a rearrangement of Mexican grant maps which are of great importance in California, involving the old diseños and expedientes of the various grants upon which a large portion of our lands depend. The necessities of the case are such that I do not believe even $2,000 will fully discharge the entire expenditure that will be made, but, however, it will be supplied elsewhere.

The present officer will see that the work is done; but I know that this addition is necessary. Hence I appeal to the chairman of the committee in view of the fact that I am not asking for anything not recommended by the Department to accede to the request.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator moves to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$2,000"?

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$2,000," that being the amount recommended.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amount estimated was $2,000, and the other House appropriated $1,500. We had no evidence before us to justify us in changing the amount provided by the other House. The Senator can offer his amendment and I shall not contest it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California to increase the amount "for books, stationery, pay of messenger, and other incidental expenses," in the office of surveyor-general of California from $1,500 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill to allow me to submit an amendment now on page 90, lines 10 and 11, which I send to the desk.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the items for the Bureau of Ordnance, page 90, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "two assistant draftsman, at $1,400 each" and insert in lieu thereof "one assistant draftsman, $1,800; one assistant draftsman, $1,400," and insert after the word "thousand" in line 14, same page, the words "four hundred," so as to make the total $12,480.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the law to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment restores the existing status.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It restores the existing status as to this one draftsman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 112, line 3. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 118, line 2, after the word "disbursing," to insert "and appointment;" in the same line, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "five;" in line 6, after the word "one," insert "from October 1, 1894;" and in line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-seven thousand and ten" and insert "thirty-five thousand and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of t he Attorney-General: For compensation of the Attorney-General, $8,000; Solicitor-General, $7,000; four assistant attorneys-general, at 5,000 each; one assistant attorney-general at the Post-Office Department, 4,000; solicitor of internal revenue, $4,500; solicitor for the Department of State, $3,500; two assistant attorneys, at $3,000 each; three assistant attorneys, at $2,500 each; one assistant attorney, $2,000; law clerk and examiners of titles, $2,700; chief clerk and ex-officio superintendent of the building, $2,500; stenographic clerk, $1,800; three stenographic clerks, at $1,600 each; two law clerks, at $2,000 each; four clerks of class 4; attorney in charge of pardons, $2,400; additional for disbursement and appointment clerk, $500; three clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; six clerks of class 1; for examination of accounts as required by section 13 of this act, three clerks of class 2 and four clerks of class 1 from October 1, 1894; one telegraph operator and stenographer, at $1,200; seven copyists; one messenger; five assistant messengers; four laborers; three watchmen; one engineer, $1,200; two conductors of the elevator, at $720 each; eight charwomen; superintendent of building, $250; and three firemen; in all, $135,060.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, after the word "law," to strike out "and miscellaneous;" so as to make the clause read:

For law books for office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 120, line 23, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And the Commissioner of Labor is authorized to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to revenue and taxation, and its general economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people.

Mr. POWER. Does the Senator from Missouri propose to allow any appropriation to carry out the amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not necessary. The Commissioner of Labor has experts and everything of the kind, and this is a direction to him to employ his force in that line. He has a sufficient appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. POWER. I understand he says $10,000 additional will be necessary to make this investigation. I do not know whether estimates have been made for it or not.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; we have not any estimates for it.

Mr. POWER. It is not estimated for?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not that we have ever seen. There may be some communication that was never communicated to us.

Mr. POWER. If so, we can take it up again.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can take it up again.

Mr. POWER. All right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriation was, on page 122, line 14, after the word "that" to strike out "the compensation of the clerks of the circuit courts of appeals shall be limited to the annual salary of $3,000 now provided by law, and that;" in line 19, after the word "costs," to strike out "and fees of whatever kind;" in line 20, after the word "them," to strike out "as such clerks" and insert "in cases disposed of during the preceding year by said courts;" in line 23, after the word "hire," to insert "and their compensation as provided by law;" in line 25, after the word "costs," to strike out "and fees;" on page 123, line 2, after the word "return," to strike out "Provided further, That the surplus of such costs and fees which may accrue on account of the fiscal year 1895 shall not be paid into the Treasury, but shall be expended, under the direction of the Attorney-General, for law books for the use of the circuit courts of appeals;" in line 7, before the word "That," to insert "Provided further;" in line 8, after the words "entitled to," to insert "retain and;" in the same line, after the word "expended," to insert "under the direction of the Attorney-General, for law books;" and in line 10, before the words "one-half," to strike out "at least;" so as to make the clause read:

For nine clerks, at $3,000 each; in all, $81,000: Provided, That said clerks shall make annually within thirty days after the 30th day of June to the Secretary of the Treasury a return of all costs collected by them in cases disposed of during the preceding year by said courts, and after deducting the incidental expenses of their respective offices, including clerk hire and their compensation as provided by law, said expenses to be certified by the senior circuit judge of the proper circuit, shall pay any surplus of such costs that may remain into the Treasury of the United States at the time of making said return: Provided further, That each circuit court of appeals shall be entitled to retain and have expended, under the direction of the Attorney-General, for law books for its use one-half of such surplus accrued therein for the fiscal year 1895.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the clause on page 122, line 23, "and their compensation as provided by law." That is in the amendment just agreed to. It is under section 9 of the act, is it not?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have that section of the act read.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not a memorandum of the date of the act. It is section 9 of the act of 1891, creating the courts of appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reserved, without objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will furnish the amendment there. It is simply to refer to section 9, of the law of a certain date. I will furnish it to the clerks; then I want to add, "not exceeding $500." The amount is not to exceed $500. That we thought better.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the Senator add the words he now proposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I propose after the words "by law," to insert the words "not exceeding $500," so as to read:

And their compensation as provided by law, not exceeding $500.

Mr. ALLISON. I have found the act. As I supposed, it is the act of March 3, 1891, providing for the establishment of the courts of appeal. The clause might as well be inserted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it read, "as provided by law under section 9 of the act of March 3, 1891."

Mr. ALLISON. It should be sections 2 and 9.

Mr. COCKRELL. "As provided by law under sections 2 and 9 of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing the circuit courts of appeal, and not exceeding $500." That is the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Is there any provision made for the salary of the clerk except in that section?

Mr. ALLISON. None, except in the two sections.

Mr. PLATT. The salary is $3,000?

Mr. ALLISON. "For nine clerks, at $3,000." This is an additional compensation not to exceed $500.

Mr. PLATT. The $3,000 is already in?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; in line 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "law," line 23, insert "under sections 2 and 9 of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing the circuit courts of appeal, and not exceeding $500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 9 on page 125.

Mr. POWER. I wish to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 125, at the end of line 9, insert:

Provided, That the marshal and district attorney of the districts of Washington, Montana, North Dakota, and South Dakota, shall, for the services they may perform during the fiscal year herein provided for, receive the fees allowed by law to like officers performing similar duties in the districts of Oregon and Idaho.

Mr. POWER. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. This has been allowed ever since those States were admitted. Each year there has been allowed double salary for the marshal and attorney of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 125, line 13, after the word "dollars," to insert "two clerks, at $1,400;" in line 15, before the word "clerks," to strike out "five" and insert "two:" in the same line, after the word "each," to insert "one clerk, at $1,000;" in line 17, before the word "and," to strike out "thirty-five thousand eight hundred" and insert "thirty-six thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Court of Claims: For salaries of five judges of the Court of Claims, at $4,500 each; chief clerk, $3,000; one assistant clerk, $2,000; bailiff, $1,500; two clerks, at $1,400; two clerks, at $1,200 each; one clerk, at $1,000; and one messenger; in all, $30,040.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, on page 126, line 10, after the word "each," to insert:

No person who holds an office the salary or annual compensation attached to which amounts to the sum of $2,500 shall be appointed to or hold any other office unless hereafter specially authorized thereto by law; but this shall not apply to retired officers of the Army or Navy whenever they may be elected to public office.

Mr. PLATT. I supposed we had a provision of law to the effect that no officer in the Government employ could draw a salary for two offices. Is there not such a law?

Mr. COCKRELL. There is such a law, but we do not think it covers the case.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator please explain why this amendment is necessary?

Mr. COCKRELL. This is simply to prohibit in certain classes of cases the payment of double salaries, and yet not to make it an invariable rule in all kinds of cases. There is an exception to be offered to it. The Senator from Iowa has the amendment to the amendment which was prepared for submission. After the words "public office," in line 15, to insert:

or whenever the President may appoint them thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment to the amendment be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "office," in line 15, on page 126, it is proposed to insert:

whenever the President shall appoint them to office by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 88, in lieu of the amendment there proposed by the committee, beginning in line 10 and ending in line 22, I offer, on behalf of the committee, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 10, on page 88, in lieu of the amendment heretofore reported by the committee, it is proposed to insert:

That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a person selected from civil life, learned in the science of astronomy, who shall be styled director of astronomy, at the United States Naval Observatory, and who shall receive an annual salary of $5,000, which is hereby appropriated. Such director shall have charge of all astronomical work at the United States Naval Observatory, not including the Nautical Almanac, and of all astronomers, assistant astronomers, and computers now employed at said Observatory; and such as may be hereafter appointed shall be under the superintendence and control of said director; and all astronomers, assistant astronomers, and computers shall hereafter be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, upon the recommendation of the director of astronomy; the salaries of such astronomers, assistant astronomers, and computers hereafter appointed to be fixed by the President, and all laws relating to astronomers, assistant astronomers, and computers at the United States Naval Observatory are hereby repealed, but nothing herein contained shall affect the salaries or terms of office of persons now holding positions as astronomers, assistant astronomers, or computers at said Observatory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CALL. I ask the chairman of the committee what changes are proposed to be made by the amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment is one prepared by the Secretary of the Navy, and the committee thought it was more complete than the one prepared by it. The amendment simply places the astronomical part of the observatory under civilian management.

Mr. CALL. I understood that to be done by the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was; but I submitted the matter to the Secretary of the Navy, and he has drawn the line between these officers more markedly than we had done.

Mr. CALL. What does the chairman of the committee say about it, whom I consider a higher authority on such matters than the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. COCKRELL. The subcommittee, after full consideration and full discussion with the Secretary of the Navy, thought that the amendment prepared by him was preferable to the one prepared by the committee.

Mr. CALL. I should like to hear the amendment read again, and to know why it is proposed in place of the amendment originally reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. COCKRELL.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand that the amendment allows the salaries to be fixed by the President?

Mr. COCKRELL. The salary of the director is fixed by the bill at $5,000.

Mr. PLATT. But this amendment provides that the salaries of the minor officials in the office shall be fixed by the President of the United States.

Mr. CALL. I do not understand how it is competent to give the President of the United States authority to fix salaries.

Mr. COCKRELL. This leaves the existing law stand.

Mr. CALL. That is the law now?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I observe that the amendment as now proposed does not commit the preparation of the Nautical Almanac to the chief astronomer?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not part of the astronomical work at all. That is done separately, and that is one of the reasons why the committee adopted this amendment in preference to the one it had prepared.

Mr. PLATT. I understand the amendment makes no change in that respect from the existing law?

Mr. COCKRELL. No. There are mathematicians in the Navy Department who attend to that work, and they are there for life just like the others. They do the part of the work which is done there, but not the astronomical part, which is separate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe we have reached the third section in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read to that point.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 73, in line 15, the committee failed to insert an amendment which I now offer. After the word "each," in that line, I move to insert:

Two carpenters, at $900 each.

I have here a letter from the Secretary of War explaining how this item was dropped out, stating that these persons are absolutely necessary, and that he can not get along without them. I ask that the letter may be read.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be printed without reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well. I ask permission to have the letter printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., July 9, 1894.

SIR: In formulating a plan for the reorganization of the civilian force of this Department, which was put into operation on the 1st instant, and which embraced reductions, transfers, and consolidations of various divisions and subdivisions in the several Bureaus, it became necessary to dispense with two employés who were borne upon the rolls as clerks, but who were actually engaged as carpenters in repairing office furniture, putting up cases, shelving, and in other work of a kindred character.

The discharge of these two men was based solely upon the fact that they were borne upon the rolls as clerks, though performing no clerical duty, it being deemed improper to continue their employment in that capacity. The services of two men are, however, imperatively needed in the work upon which the men above referred to have hitherto been engaged, and in order that the Department may suffer no embarrassment I have the honor to request that the pending legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be amended by the insertion therein of an item providing for two additional carpenters for this Department at $900 each.

This, it should be understood, is not in the nature of an increase, as compared with the appropriation for the last fiscal year, but is an actual decrease, independent of other decreases in the portion of the pending bill relating to this Department, to the extent that in effect it substitutes two carpenters at $900 each, for two clerks (engaged as carpenters) at $1,000 each.

It is intended that the two carpenters to be employed under the provision herein asked, shall be under the supervision and direction of the carpenter already authorized and employed at $1,000 per annum.

Very respectfully,

DANIEL S. LAMONT,
Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN of the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. In order to conform to the amendment I have moved, the total in line 17 should be changed to $92,900.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Under the head of War Department, on page 73, in line 15, after the word "each," it is proposed to insert "two carpenters at $900 each;" and in line 17, after the word "all," to strike out "$91,100," and insert "$92,900."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 121, line 14, there is an item allowing $250 to the Commissioner of Labor for postage stamps, etc. He says he absolutely requires $350 for that purpose. I move to strike out the word "two" before "hundred" and insert "three;" so as to make the amount "$350."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 20, on page 121, in the clause making appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Department of Labor, I move to strike out "$500" and insert "$750." The Commissioner of Labor says that $750 for contingent expenses is absolutely necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say to the chairman of the committee that, while at present I make no suggestion of amendment, I desire to reserve the privilege, in case I find it necessary to do so, of moving to amend the bill on page 122, in reference to the clerks of courts. I may desire to offer an amendment to insert an appropriation for the salary of an additional clerk. I shall explain the matter to-morrow morning after I have looked up the record.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 14, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 13, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

H. W. SHIPLEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (S. 420) for the relief of H. W. Shipley; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOSEPH G. UTTER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following resolution from the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1343) to remove the charge of desertion against the name of Joseph G. Utter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the request of the Senate for the return of this bill will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MILITARY ROAD FROM EL PASO TO FORT BLISS, TEX.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7419) for the construction of a military road from the city of El Paso to Fort Bliss, Tex.

The bill was read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I call for the regular order.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5894) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. BRICE, Mr. CALL, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6893) to regulate water-main assessments in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. BRICE, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CULLOM as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6108) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. BRICE, and Mr. HALE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the message just received from the Senate be read from the Clerk's desk, as I am sure very few members understood it as announced.

The Clerk read the message from the Senate.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DURBOROW. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] states that he rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. DURBOROW. I send to the Clerk's desk a copy of the Chicago Times of the 9th instant, and ask to have read the paragraph I have marked.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the article.

The Clerk read as follows:

Representative DURBOROW in discussing the strike troubles said: "Only one thing can now save the country from being plunged into an armed conflict between labor and capital, which will postpone indefinitely the establishment between genuine workingmen and men of legitimate business—actual producers and actual exchangers—of the modus vivendi for which all men of action are industriously working. That one means of averting a class war was concisely put by an ex-Confederate general who has sat on the supreme bench of a Southern State. Said he: 'Altgeld has chosen the field of battle with consummate strategy. By keeping the fight strictly to the question of State's rights upon which he has commenced it, he will avert the further embittering of class feeling, and will at the same time deliver the United States at large from the bugaboo of Federal centralization.

"Let him expel the Federal troops who, in contempt of the sacred principle of home rule and of the prerogatives of the mayor of Chicago and of the governor of the State, invaded Illinois and the typical American city. Let him do this boldly and decisively. Let him not simply call upon the militia of the State—a weaker showing than the strongest possible might well entail bloodshed—but let him at the outset call for volunteers from the State at large. If he does the issue will never come to a fight. The force exhibited will be too overwhelming. The Federal will withdraw in the face of such a demonstration of popular determination as such a summons would bring forth. The governors of the States of the South and West would refuse to sustain Cleveland in his attempted violation of State right. Without shedding a drop of blood the danger of conflict would be averted, the dignity of the States be maintained, and respect for law and order be strengthened rather than weakened with the people."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DURBOROW. I desire to state that I do not now entertain, nor have I ever entertained, such sentiments as are expressed in the paragraph just read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois will suspend a moment. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to make a point of order. I have not the slightest objection to the gentleman from Illinois making any personal explanation that he deems proper. But I do not want a precedent established here that a matter of this kind presents a question of personal privilege. The mere publication in a newspaper of what purports to be the unofficial utterance of a gentleman who happens to be a member of Congress is not sufficient ground for a question of personal privilege. But upon a request to make a personal explanation, I have no doubt the House will give unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois stated that he rose to a matter of personal privilege. The Chair hardly thinks this presents such a question; but if there be no objection the gentleman will be permitted to make a personal explanation. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DURBOROW. I only want to say that I have never expressed, by word of mouth or in writing, to any person or persons, at any time whatsoever, such sentiments as are attributed to me in the paragraph just read.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MOUNT STERLING, KY.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 1988) to erect a post-office building in the city of Mount Sterling, Montgomery County, Ky.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO FILE REPORTS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (when the Committee on Public Lands was called). I ask unanimous consent that I may file during the day a report from the Committee on Public Lands, which is not now quite ready. I ask this permission because I may be called away to-morrow.

There being no objection, leave was so granted.

Mr. STOCKDALE (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). I ask unanimous consent to file during the day a report from the Committee on the Judiciary on House bill No. 4727. The report is not quite completed at this time.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

APPOINTMENT OF DISTRICT JUDGE FOR SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI.

Subsequently,

Mr. STOCKDALE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4727) to appoint a district judge for the southern district of Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS ON UNSURVEYED GOVERNMENT LANDS.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3655) for the relief of settlers on unsurveyed Government lands lying within certain railroad land grants; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SECTION 40, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr DE ARMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 7274) to repeal section 40 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which were ordered to be printed with the views of the majority.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;

A bill (H. R. 4671) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of Joseph S. Utter;

A bill (H. R. 5601) to authorize the construction of a wagon and foot bridge across the South, or Main, Canadian River at or near the town of Noble, in Oklahoma Territory;

A bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895;

A bill (H. R. 7506) authorizing the county of Coconino, Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds for the construction of a county building at the county seat thereof;

A bill (S. 73) for the relief of William J. Cornell and Joseph M. Cornell; and

A bill (S. 1573) making an appropriation for rewriting the Consular Regulations.

MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report submitted by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6558) to amend section No. 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

THOMAS A. E. WEADOCK,
F. C. TATE,
GEORGE B. SHAW,
Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM M. STEWART,
WILLIAM B. BATE,
JOHN M. PALMER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

Statement to accompany conference report on H. R. 6558.

The House bill, as reported by the committee on mines and mining, provided that the $100 worth of labor required on each mining claim, located since 1872 should not be required for the year 1894, and was in all respects similar to the law enacted on the same subject in 1893, suspending the same requirements for that year. The House amended the bill by excepting from its provisions the second district of Colorado, where it seems that those interested in mining are not agreed upon the necessity of the law in that district.

The Senate amended the bill by striking out the exception made by the House amendment to the bill reported from the committee. The House having refused its concurrence, and conferees having been appointed and considered the question, they recommended that the House recede from its disagreement and agree to the bill as it was originally reported.

T. A. E. WEADOCK.
F. C. TATE.
G. W. B. SHAW.

Mr. WEADOCK. Unless some further explanation of the bill is desired other than that which is contained in the statement, I shall ask for the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. COOMBS. Do the Colorado people agree to this?

Mr. WEADOCK. Yes, sir.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the conference report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WEADOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MALLORY) there were—ayes 88, noes 17.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

HEIRS OF ROBERT J. SMITH AND OTHERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution as a substitute for House bills 1414 to 1450, both inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following bills (H. R. 1414, 1415, 1416, 1417, 1418, 1419, 1420, 1421, 1422, 1423, 1424, 1425, 1426, 1427, 1428, 1429, 1430, 1431, 1432, 1433, 1434, 1435, 1436, 1437, 1438, 1439, 1440, 1441, 1442, 1443, 1444, 1445, 1446, 1447, 1448, 1449, and 1450) for the relief of the heirs of Robert J. Smith; Octavius A. White, trustee; John F. Werner; William Wilson; heirs and devisees of Henry McKee; Evalina Ann E. Fripp; John Duncan, survivor; heirs of Benjamin Chaplin; Thomas White, executor and testamentary trustee of the last will and testament of Joseph D. Edings, deceased; Edward M. Capers; heirs of Stephen Whitehead; William H. Conner at and Clarence S. Conner at; Samuel A. Nelson; heirs of Richard N. Kittles; Frederick W. Clausson; Mortimer W. Venning; Stockton E. Slawson; heirs of Charles B. Capers; C. L. Slawson; William Neyle Habersham; William R. Herron; Louisa G. Heyward and others; James D. McDowall, administrator of William D. McDowall, deceased; Francis T. Capers; Joseph S. Baynard and others; Daniel T. Pope; heirs of James Wells; heirs of Joseph James Pope, sr.; heirs of Franklin P. Pope, deceased; heirs of James B. Seabrook; heirs of John A. P. Scott; heirs and devisees of John J. T. Pope; heirs of Robert W. Fuller; George W. Williams & Co.; Robert G. Lamar; George Jacob Huthmacher; and the heirs of Isaac Newman, deceased, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims to find the amount due and report the same to Congress.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that this resolution be passed over informally in the absence of Mr. MCLAURIN, who made the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first state the parliamentary status. The Chair is advised that when the Committee of the Whole rose last, there was a point of no quorum made on a motion to lay aside this resolution with favorable recommendation; no quorum appeared on that motion, and the committee rose.

The first business in order is the resumption of the count by tellers. Pending that, however, the gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to lay aside this resolution without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. COOMBS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. I am satisfied that not a half-dozen men in the House know what this resolution is. It was impossible to hear a word of the reading of it here.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, it will be again reported.

Mr. KILGORE. I think we would be entitled to have each bill specified in that resolution read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the reading of the several bills, each one of them mentioned in the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is dividing, however, on a proposition to lay the resolution aside.

Mr. ENLOE. I hope the gentleman from Texas will permit this to pass over for the present; that is the request.

Mr. KILGORE. I did not object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not insist upon the further reading.

Mr. COOMBS. I will ask the Chair to restate the parliamentary status. I think that some mistake has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement of the Chair was made on the recollection of the Clerk at the desk. The Chair is advised that the House was voting on the motion to lay the resolution aside with a favorable recommendation, on which vote no quorum appeared, whereupon the committee rose. The Chair has no other information than that.

Mr. BURROWS. Is the Chair quite certain that that is the pending motion? I supposed that the general debate had been exhausted. I did not know that the matter had reached that stage where the motion to lay it aside could be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is so informed by the Journal Clerk.

Mr. BURROWS. I have no personal recollection of the matter, but think that is a mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time.

Mr. BARTLETT. The RECORD shows a different state of facts. A side issue had been presented, which was discussed——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York be kind enough to send the RECORD to the desk?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that my request would dispose of that question, if the gentleman from New York will withdraw his objection.

Mr. COOMBS. I will withdraw the objection, with the understanding that this resolution loses its place on the Calendar.

Mr. ENLOE. That was not the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon an examination of the RECORD, it appears that no motion was made to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BURROWS. That was my impression.

The CHAIRMAN. And the bill is still in the Committee of the Whole under the general debate.

Mr. BURROWS. That is correct.

Mr. COOMBS. That was my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair is advised that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] is entitled to the floor, five minutes having been yielded to him by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. ENLOE. Pending that, I again submit the request that this matter be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects, and is now recognized for five minutes to address the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the bills now under consideration, or rather the bills embraced in the resolution offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SHELL], provide for the ultimate appropriation of over $1,000,000, all of which is to go to one district in South Carolina.

On the occasion of the last debate, on the 25th day of May, some question was made about the propriety of abolishing the Court of Claims, and the distinguished lawyer from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SAYERS], in answer to a query of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BUNN], said that he would abolish the court at once.

I wish to say a few words in behalf of the Court of Claims. That court is not a party court. Although the judges who now adorn the bench were all appointed by Republican Presidents, in its organization in 1855 it was created by the Democratic party, and the first three judges were appointed by President Pierce. The gentlemen I refer to were Isaac Blackford, of Indiana, who for many years had been a reporter of the State Reports; John J. Gilchrist, who had filled the highest judicial post in the State of New Hampshire; and George Scarburgh, of Virginia. These were all Democrats. The successive occupants of that bench have all been good lawyers. The men who now occupy it are men of high character and of marked legal ability.

Look at the record of that court. Out of one hundred and thirty-five cases taken on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States since the year 1882, only eighteen cases have been reversed in whole or in part. There is no circuit court of the United States, nor any district court, which has a better record.

There would seem to be a decided misconception on the part of many members of this House as to the scope and meaning of the Bowman act of 1883 and of the Tucker act of 1887. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] on the occasion of the last debate suggested that the resolution should have incorporated in it the words, "Referred under the Bowman act."

Now, there can be no such reference of cases such as those embraced in this resolution; that is, cases barred by the statute of limitations, which was in force at the time of the passage of the Bowman act. There can be no reference of such cases to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act. The only way in which these matters can be sent to the Court of Claims is under the act of 1887, popularly known as the Tucker act. There is no limitation in that act over our power as to remitting or transmitting any claim to the Court of Claims for an inquiry as to the facts.

But I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that references under the Bowman act and the Tucker act are advisory, and that there can only be a reference to ascertain and report the facts. It is as if issues of fact were sent to a jury for determination, and the findings of fact were to be returned in the form of a special verdict. That is the only function of the Court of Claims, under section 1 of the Bowman act and under section 14 of the Tucker act.

Now, I submit that this resolution is in an improper form, because it goes beyond that and asks that court to find a judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield to the gentleman from New York ten minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should state at the outset that I do not regard this question as a partisan or factional one. I believe we should look at these Southern claims just as if the condition of things were transposed, just as if the North had been vanquished and the South had been victorious, and I am willing to take my position on these claims according to that standard.

I look at these claims as a lawyer. I look at them as to be adjudged by the law of nations, by international law; for all questions of constitutional law have no bearing whatever when we enter upon a condition of belligerency, when we are dealing with those who are regarded by the law as enemies. So that the only question is, What is the proper test under the rules of international law? All these claims naturally arrange themselves under three heads. The first heading may be said to embrace claims which are made for the use and occupation of real estate by the armies or the naval forces of the United States at the seat of war, and those claims which are for the destruction of or damage to property.

None of these claims should ever be paid, because it is well settled that for any devastation which occurs in the track of war or for any tort, no government is liable. It is so well settled that even an alien can not get compensation for his property which has been destroyed in the natural course of military operations. Look at the case in France, when Earl Granville was secretary of state for foreign affairs, after the Franco-Prussian war. He said: "England can have no claim for the millions of dollars that she has lost during the operations of the Prussians in France."

Now, if that law applies to aliens, I go further and say it applies to the friends of the belligerent, and it certainly must apply to the enemy himself.

What is the second class of cases? I will take the cases covered by the Bowman act for stores and supplies—in all about $37,000,000 were claimed. Now, under the Bowman act 10½ per cent of the cases already disposed of have been allowed by the Court of Claims, or $1,600,000 in round numbers. They have adjudicated upon $15,000,000, and the balance of some $22,000,000 remain for adjudication.

I think all these claims for cotton, beef, mules, horses, and cattle furnished to the loyal armies during the war should be paid; but I do not think the door should be opened one inch further. I draw your attention, gentlemen, to the fact that whether these claims have amounted in the aggregate to $400,000,000 or only $37,000,000, they should be judged by the same law. I draw your attention to the fact that the aggregate of claims presented has always exceeded enormously the claims which have been allowed.

I call your attention to the fact that the first of these claims for stores and supplies, the first series presented to the Treasury Department, through the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General amounted to $40,000,000 and that only $6,000,000 were approved, and that subsequently, before the Southern Claims Commission which succeeded to the functions of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General under act of 1871, $60,000,000 were claimed and $4,636,000 have been found to be justly due.

Now, I come to the third class of cases, those embraced within this resolution, claims for cotton taken or seized and sold, and the proceeds alleged to have been covered into the Treasury of the United States. One word as to the alleged trust relation, which is based on the theory that the Supreme Court of the United States in 1871 said that a trust had arisen in behalf of those people who owned the cotton. Chief Justice Chase in that opinion said that a trust has arisen for those declared by this act to be entitled; and six years later, in the Knote case and in the Young case, the Supreme Court of the United States said that no trust had arisen for anyone who did not bring himself fairly within the terms of that act. In the latter case Chief Justice Waite said: "As to all persons within the privileges of the act the proceeds were held in trust, but as to all others the title of the United States as captor was absolute." In other words, no trust relation has arisen for anyone who did not file his petition within two years after the suppression of the rebellion or within two years after August 20, 1866, when the rebellion was declared to have ceased. I call your attention to a pretty good Democratic authority on this question of cotton taken during the civil war. I draw your attention to a letter written by the Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, then Secretary of State, in 1886 to Mr. Muruaga, where he says that—

> Cotton, in fact, was to the Confederacy as much munitions of war as powder and ball, for it furnished the chief means of obtaining those indispensable of warfare. In international law there could be no question as to the right of the Federal commanders to seize it as contraband of war, whether they found it on rebel territory or intercepted it on the way to the parties who were to furnish in return material aid in the form of the sinews of war, arms, or general supplies.

The same principle was laid down, the same view of the condition of facts was adopted by Chief Justice Chase in the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton, where he says the Southern forces, rather than to permit the cotton to fall into the hands of the Northern army, would invariably destroy it, and he refers to the fact that prior to the evacuation of New Orleans $80,000,000 worth of cotton was destroyed; and he speaks of the further fact that on this very plantation of Mrs. Alexander $1,000,000 worth had been destroyed by the owners the previous year rather than to let it fall into the hands of the enemy—the Union forces.

Now, I say, gentlemen, no claims such as those embraced in this resolution should be referred to the Court of Claims. Let us divest our minds entirely of any party. Let us decide that none of these claims for cotton should be paid. Let us dispose of the question at once. I should say there are about $10,000,000 remaining of the captured and abandoned property fund in the Treasury; and it may be some $2,500,000 of that should be repaid to the parties who can prove their ownership on due proof of loyalty.

About $10,000,000 of that fund has already been paid to the claimants, and the aggregate of claims filed amounted to $77,000,000; and that is some indication of the danger, owing to the lapse of time, of fraud and fraudulent claims. For that reason we should be doubly careful; and I ask you gentlemen now to dispose of this resolution and not to allow this issue, the ascertainment of facts, to go to the Court of Claims. If we do not believe in the payment of these claims it is an error of judgment and a waste of time to burden the Court of Claims with any inquiry or finding as to the facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I understand this resolution includes a great many claims which have not been investigated by the committee at all. Is that true?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes. It was stated on the occasion of the last debate here, I think by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN] who presented this resolution, that the committee did not think it worth while to inquire into these cases; that in substance they thought the easiest way was to send them to the Court of Claims. Now, it seems to me that it is the duty of that committee to inquire carefully into the nature of claims coming before them. Why, sir, look at the form of this resolution.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Is there not an express statute providing that claims of this character may be sent by the committee to the Court of Claims for an ascertainment of the facts concerning them? Is not that the provision of the Tucker act?

Mr. BARTLETT. The fourteenth section of the Tucker act gives either House of Congress the power to send any claim to that court; but I do not think a committee would have the power to send these claims to the Court of Claims for ascertainment of the facts.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], when this subject was under discussion before, made the point that these claims should be sent by the committee to the court for an investigation with reference to the facts; and he thought that the committee, and those favoring this proposition on the floor, did not want a mere finding of the facts, but wanted judgments.

Mr. BARTLETT. It would seem to me there is a great deal in that idea, because the form of the resolution is very suspicious. It does not refer these cases for the ascertainment of the facts and a report to the House; but it provides in substance that the court shall hear and determine the amounts due. I forget the exact phraseology; but that is the substance.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN].

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, we have already consumed an entire day in debating this matter; and I desire now to test the sense of the Committee of the Whole on the question and bring it to an immediate issue. All of these bills were embodied in one resolution in order to save time and for the sake of convenience.

As I understand, there is a large amount of money in the Treasury Department set apart especially under the law for the payment of claims of this character; in other words, it is a trust fund. And all that was intended by this resolution was that the parties making these claims might be permitted to go to the court and establish their lien, or their right to a portion of this trust fund.

Now, I desire to make a motion that this resolution be reported back to the House, and that we now vote upon the question, closing debate as soon as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is not yet closed.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Well, I hope the gentleman from Michigan, at the conclusion of his remarks, will make that motion, so that we may stop debate, and test the sense of the committee. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, in the two or three minutes allowed me, I desire to say only that I am as anxious as any member of the committee can possibly be to dispose of this stumbling block, which stands at the head of the Private Calendar. If I were entirely certain that a motion to report this resolution back to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table would prevail, I would make that motion. But if such a motion should fail, there might then be some question as to the right of amendment. I am perfectly willing that general debate be closed or considered as closed at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that request?

Mr. BURROWS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed on this question. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, general debate having been closed, the resolution is now, of course, open for amendment. I wish to offer an amendment for the purpose of testing the sense of the committee. I move to amend by striking out in the second line of the resolution the figures "1425," being the number of the bill which I send to the desk, and which, if my motion prevails, will not be included in this resolution. I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

A bill (H. R. 1425) for the relief of William H. Connerat and Clarence S. Connerat.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized, directed, and required to pay to William H. Connerat and Clarence S. Connerat, heirs of Joseph V. Connerat, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $153,000, in full satisfaction of any and all demands against the United States arising out of the seizure and sale of property belonging to the said Joseph V. Connerat, deceased, upon their executing a release of any and all claims and demands of every kind and nature whatsoever against the United States on account of said seizure.

Mr. BURROWS. The committee will observe that this bill provides for the payment of $153,000 for the seizure and use of certain property—not cotton—this is not a cotton claim. I wish a vote on this amendment with a view of testing the sense of the committee on this class of claims.

Mr. MCNAGNY. This seizure is alleged or conceded to have been at the seat of war and during hostilities?

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, yes, sir; there is no question about that.

Mr. MCNAGNY. So that this claim would be entirely barred under any statute now in force?

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose there is no question about that. As I was about to say, if the Committee of the Whole should adopt my amendment it will clearly indicate, I think, that the committee is opposed to the passage of this resolution; and if my motion should prevail I shall move further to amend by striking out all these bills, or to report back the resolution with an unfavorable recommendation.

I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE].

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I think this resolution for the reference of these claims to the Court of Claims ought not to pass. This is not a resolution for reference under the Bowman act or the Tucker act; it provides for a reference under the general law; and my judgment is that if Congress should refer these claims under this resolution, it would carry with it the right to render judgment for the amounts that may be found due upon these claims.

I am not willing that the Court of Claims should render judgment in favor of a few favored parties for the whole amount found due to them, to be paid out of the captured and abandoned property fund. I want all claims against this fund to receive an equitable share of the distribution of it and to have them all adjudicated alike, so that each one may have a fair proportion of the fund remaining on hand.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Under this act, if it is carried into execution and the judgment is rendered in favor of the claimant—and of course every judgment rendered is necessarily conclusive under this provision—would that not necessarily absorb the whole fund for the benefit of a few claimants named here?

Mr. ENLOE. I do not know that it would absorb all, but it would absorb a large proportion of it.

Mr. COX. Certainly a large proportion of it.

Mr. ENLOE. And in my judgment, if it is a trust fund to be distributed to persons having an interest in it, it should be distributed on a pro rata basis to all alike.

I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will be adopted, as an indication of the intention of the committee to make an unfavorable recommendation on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the amendment of Mr. BURROWS was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I now move that this resolution be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 222) to remit the penalties on the dynamite-gun cruiser Vesuvius.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally. I am quite unwell to-day, and do not feel able to discuss the matter.

There was no objection, and the bill was informally passed over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of the city of Raleigh, N. C.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BUNN] is not present; at least, I do not see him; and I ask, therefore, that this be passed over informally.

There was no objection.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 903) to provide for the payment of the claim of Edward Hurley for paving Second street, in Sedalia, Mo., in front of the Sedalia post-office building.

Mr. LOUD. I make the same request in regard to that bill.

There was no objection, and the bill was passed over without prejudice.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 286) to authorize the payment of damages sustained by the State of Pennsylvania from Union and Confederate troops during the late war, as adjudicated and liquidated by the State of Pennsylvania under the provisions of an act of the General Assembly.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who has charge of that bill is absent sick, and I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2767) for the relief of Dr. Nathan Fletcher.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not see the gentleman who has charge of that bill in his seat, and I ask that the same order be made in respect to it that has just been made as to the preceding bill.

There was no objection.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1125) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of William E. Woodbridge.

Mr. LOUD. I ask that that also be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 23) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the city of Lincoln, Nebr., one-half of the cost of constructing certain pavements in front of the Government square.

Mr. LOUD. I make the same request in regard to that bill.

There was no objection.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 415) to submit to the Court of Private Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask that that bill be passed over informally.

There was no objection.

GEORGE M'ALPIN.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2717) for the relief of George McAlpin, to repay to him moneys unlawfully collected from him by the United States.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, my colleague, Mr. MCALEER, who introduced this bill, is absent, and in accordance with his wishes, I ask consent that it go over for the present, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MAHON. I will state to the gentleman that I have charge of the bill in his absence.

Mr. REILLY. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas George McAlpin was the sutler of the Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry during the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, and was during those years required by the United States, at the United States custom-house at Baltimore, Md., to pay the sum of 3 per cent on the value of all of the supplies shipped to him during said years within the lines of the Army; and

Whereas he was thus unlawfully and unjustly required to pay to the United States, and did thus unlawfully and unjustly pay the sum of $6,906.18, being 3 per cent on $230,206.29, to the United States, as appears by the books of the custom-house at Baltimore, Md.: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed to pay to the said George McAlpin, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,906.18.

Mr. MAHON. Let the report be read, which fully explains the character of the bill.

The report (by Mr. MAHON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2042) for the relief of George McAlpin, report as follows:

This case was referred to the Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-second Congress, and was favorably reported upon by that committee. After an investigation of the facts involved, the report of that committee is adopted, a copy thereof being attached hereto, and your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 2186, Fifty-second Congress, second session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8200) for the relief of George McAlpin, to repay him moneys unlawfully collected from him by the United States, respectfully make the following report:

George McAlpin was appointed sutler of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry in November, 1862, and served in that capacity down to the close of the war, in 1865. His appointment was made under the act of March 19, 1862, providing for the appointment of sutlers for each regiment in the public service. This regiment served in the Army of the James, in the State of Virginia. As sutler he was required to purchase goods, which he did mostly in the city of Baltimore, from which city they were shipped through the lines to the point where the regiment was in service, under regulations regulating such service.

Between the 3d of November, 1862, and the 12th of May, 1865, Mr. McAlpin purchased sutler's stores, mostly in Baltimore, provided for in said act and the revised schedules provided for therein, and had them consigned to himself at different points in the State of Virginia—Old Point, Newport News, Suffolk, Portsmouth, Norfolk, Yorktown, Williamsburg, Bermuda Hundred, Fort Monroe, and other points. Between these dates he purchased and shipped goods to the amount of $235,074.69, which were cleared through the custom-house at Baltimore. The amount of stores so shipped appears from the certified statements from the custom-house at Baltimore.

Under the fifth section of an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," it is provided—

"That the President may, in his discretion, license and permit commercial intercourse with any such part of a State or section the inhabitants of which are so declared in the state of insurrection, in such articles, and for such time, and by such persons as he in his discretion may think most conducive of the public interest, and such intercourse, so far as by him licensed, shall be conducted and carried on only in pursuance of rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. And the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint such officers at places where officers of the customs are not now authorized by law as may be needed to carry into effect such licenses, rules, and regulations, and officers of the customs and other officers shall receive for services under this section and under said rules and regulations such fees and compensation as are now allowed for similar service under other provisions of law."

Under the provisions of this act certain regulations were prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and, among others, one with reference to the transfer or clearing of sutlers' goods through the custom-house.

Under the heading, "Sutlers' permits, how obtained, and upon what conditions," is regulation 24, as follows:

"Permits will be granted to settlers to transport to the regiments sutlered by them such articles as they are authorized to sell free of the 5 per cent fee: but no permit will be granted to a sutler except on presentation to the proper permit officer of the original certificate of his appointment, or the commanding officer of his regiment, countersigned by the division commander thereof, and an application and affidavit in the form prescribed. Transportation shall not be permitted to any sutler of any amount of goods exceeding $2,500 per month, nor for over two months' supply at one time, nor for any goods except such as he is by law and War Department orders allowed to deal in."

Trade regulation 42:

"Fee for permit so to purchase or sell and transport to or from such district other products, goods, wares, or merchandise, 5 per cent on the sworn invoice value thereof at the place of shipment. Fee for each permit for individual, family, or plantation supplies on every purchase over $20 and not over $50, 5 cents."

Subsequently, on March 21, 1864, this regulation was modified by the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

"The forty-second trade regulation, series of September 11, 1863, is hereby so far modified that on and after the 1st day of April next the invoice valuation permit fee on shipments to and from insurrectionary districts will be 3 per cent instead of 5, as therein prescribed."

Mr. McAlpin complied with all the rules and regulations relative to his appointment and qualifications, procuring the proper certificate and making the necessary affidavit to bring him within all the provisions of the act regulating his appointment and the regulations thereunder, above prescribed.

By a mistake of the custom-house officers at the custom-house in Baltimore, Mr. McAlpin was charged 5 per cent and 3 per cent fees on all such shipments through the custom-house, charging them to him as a trader instead of under the regulation above mentioned for sutlers. The amount of payment so made was $6,906.18.

Under the above acts of Congress and the regulations mentioned, no fees should have been charged on sutler's goods such as were shipped by Mr. McAlpin through the custom-house at Baltimore, and, therefore, the amount paid by him to the Government, to wit, the said sum of $6,906.18, was wrongfully collected from him, as there was no law or regulation of the Treasury authorizing such collections.

Your committee find from the evidence adduced before them that the said sum was paid to the United States through the custom-house at Baltimore without any warrant of law.

Your committee also find from the evidence adduced, that Mr. McAlpin fully complied with all the laws, rules, and regulations governing the duties of sutlers and paid all the legal fees and taxes relating to the office of army sutler, and, therefore, respectfully recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have the gentleman in charge of this bill make a brief statement of the facts on which it is based.

Mr. COOMBS. At the same time state whether any protest was entered at the time these fees were paid.

Mr. MAHON. No, no protest was entered at the time, for the claimant did not know that it was an improper exaction.

This man, Mr. Chairman, is not a constituent of mine; I never met him until about four months ago, when I saw him for the first time. He is an old man now, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, in quite feeble health.

This bill was offered for him by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MCALEER. It was referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on War Claims, and I made a very careful examination of it. All the evidence was examined, and the committee were satisfied, unanimously, that this $6,000 had been collected from him without any warrant of law whatever.

The custom-house officer at the city of Baltimore collected the 5 per cent customs duties from this old man, which the law required the officer to collect upon goods coming into that port. This man paid these duties and had his goods shipped into Virginia, or to that part of the army to which he was attached.

The greater portion of these goods, in a raid somewhere in Virginia, were destroyed, and the old gentleman lost about $75,000 worth of goods. The truth of it is he went into the Army as a sutler worth about $60,000, and through the misfortunes of war he came out a bankrupt. Now, as I said before, I have no personal interest in this old gentleman, beyond the matter of right involved, and I am satisfied beyond all controversy of the justice of this claim, and there was not a man on the War Claims Committee but what was satisfied of it beyond all question.

Mr. BYNUM. Was this bill submitted to the Treasury Department for any suggestions they might have to make?

Mr. MAHON. Yes. The Treasury Department have made no recommendations, except that they gave us a certified copy of the report of the collector at the port of Baltimore during the time these duties were paid, showing that this man paid this amount of money.

Mr. BYNUM. Was the question submitted to the Department for their decision?

Mr. MAHON. They could not do anything about it except to give us the papers to show the payment.

Mr. BYNUM. The committee have not consulted the Department as to the propriety of paying this claim?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; we consulted them.

Mr. BYNUM. I notice there is no letter from the Department indorsing this claim.

Mr. MAHON. The committee was satisfied that there was no law authorizing the collection of any tax of this kind from this old man, and the only thing the committee had to do beside that was to ascertain from the Treasury Department the amount of money so illegally collected from him, and the Treasury Department have furnished us the statement which I hold in my hand.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What kind of a tax was this?

Mr. MAHON. A regular customs duty of 5 per cent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Collected at the port of Baltimore?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; the same duty that was imposed on other goods.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they imposed a similar duty on other goods, and this man simply paid the usual lawful duties, then what kind of a claim has he got to get this amount back again?

Mr. MAHON. I will tell the gentleman. Permits were granted to sutlers to transport to the regiments in the field and sell to the soldiers such articles as they were authorized to sell, free of that 5 per cent duty. Such permits were issued to the sutlers with their regular papers; but this customs officer, in violation of this permit, charged the 5 per cent that the Treasury Department had authorized the collectors of ports not to collect from sutlers.

Mr. LOUD. How long a period did this cover?

Mr. MAHON. About fifteen months.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman if this sutler did not, in the regular order of business, contemplate that this was the law, pay the duty without protest, and sell his goods for and in consideration of the fact that he had paid this tax, and collect it from the soldiers in the army as a part of the one, two, three, or five hundred per cent on his goods which sutlers usually charged?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know anything about that. The sutler connected with my brigade did not wrong the soldiers. There may have been men who did; but the truth is this man went into service as a sutler, well to do, and by this raid in Virginia he lost $75,000 worth of property, and most of the property on which he paid these duties was destroyed.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not a fact now, that when he came to sell these goods or to mark the price on them, that he added to the price this 5 per cent tax which they made him pay, and sold the goods for that additional price and got the money back in that way?

Mr. MAHON. I have just stated that the larger part of the goods were destroyed.

Mr. KILGORE. That is the risk that everybody takes in war.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He had already marked up the price, had he not?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know.

Mr. RAY. I should like to ask whether or not this claim was ever presented to Congress before?

Mr. MAHON. I can not tell.

Mr. RAY. Whether it has ever been presented, since the close of the war, until now?

Mr. MAHON. I can not answer that?

Mr. KILGORE. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him one further question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. This was a tariff tax, collected at the custom-house, was it not?

Mr. MAHON. Well, yes.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand your theory is that the foreigner pays the tax, and therefore the old man would not pay anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. We had not adopted that theory at that time.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order and inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I respectfully submit, if it is not too late, the inquiry and to make the point of order, if it is not too late, how is it that this claim went to the Committee on War Claims? It is not a war claim in any sense.

Mr. MAHON. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is too late to raise the point of order, consideration having been entered upon.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take any more time with this bill. I do not propose that the House shall have this bill before it all day, so far as I am concerned. I want to state again that I have no personal interest in this old gentleman, except that I am satisfied beyond all controversy that this Government has taken away from him six thousand and some odd hundred dollars without any authority of law.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did this man pay this amount of money under protest?

Mr. MAHON. I can not tell; I am not close enough in relation to him to know.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I understand that this man is a Democrat, and that therefore the point made by my friend from Texas would not be good as to him.

Mr. MAHON. I do not know whether he is a Democrat. I do not know what his politics are. I know that he is a very old man, and from my intercourse with him I find him to be a very intelligent old gentleman. And I know further that this Government owes him over $6,000.

I know that he is in destitute circumstances. I want to present these facts to this House and to state that if there has ever been a claim that has come from that committee which is a just one this is one; and if the United States Government proposes to pay people what they owe them, this is one of the claims which should be paid. If you propose to do what no honest citizen would do, take money from people unlawfully and refuse to return it, then you can vote this bill down.

I make my final appeal in this case, and I state that I have no interest whatever in it; but after a careful examination made by the Committee on War Claims, I find that this Government has over $6,000 of money taken from this old man without the slightest authority of law whatever. If you want him paid, pass this bill; and if not, vote it down.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I understand as a matter of fact that in making these reports from the Committee on War Claims they never have examined the bill at all, except the gentleman in charge of the bill reports to the committee that he has examined the bill and then upon his ipse dixit it is reported to the House. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if, as a matter of fact, in any examination made by the Committee on War Claims on the merits of this bill any evidence was before that committee, and now before the House, that these articles ought not to have been charged the very amount of duty which was paid.

Mr. MAHON. In answer to the gentleman I will say this. That were the gentleman from Texas a member of that committee, and any bill of this kind was submitted to him, and he stated that he had made a careful examination of the law and the facts and reported that bill back to the committee, I, as a member of that committee, would have accepted his statement as a verity. This bill was referred to myself. As I said, I know nothing about the old gentleman or his goods.

I examined the law carefully, and I found that the Treasury Department had directed the custom-house officers to pass goods through the custom-house without the collection of the 3 and 5 per cent from every sutler who passed goods through the other custom-houses of the country, and they were exempt from this duty. But this old gentleman, owing, as I think, to the fact that he lived down in that part of the country dealing in Baltimore, and shipping his goods from there, was required to pay the duty. The great majority of goods imported were through Boston, New York, and the Eastern cities in the North which were in sympathy with the Union Army. This old gentleman, being a resident of Maryland, or somewhere down there, purchased the goods in a Southern State, and through that fact the duties were collected from them.

I have thoroughly examined the case, and I have found that the duties were collected without any authority of law, and in direct violation of the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has furnished reports from which it is found, after a careful examination, that this man paid $6,318 and some odd cents.

Mr. HUTCHESON. He made no protest about it. It was a voluntary payment?

Mr. MAHON. The facts were all submitted to the full committee, who unanimously reported this bill.

Mr. HUTCHESON. As I understand the facts there was no protest made at all.

Mr. MAHON. The man did not know anything about it.

Mr. HUTCHESON. There was a voluntary payment.

Mr. MAHON. He paid because he did not know any better.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be stating the case within the bounds of moderation to say that there could be trumped up in the United States—or if that term be offensive to anybody, there could be gotten up in the United States—anywhere from five billions to ten billions of dollars of claims against the United States Treasury which would be more legitimate than this one.

Mr. MAHON. If the gentleman will go to the Treasury Department, or the custom-houses and make examination, I will risk the fate of my bill upon his finding a similar case to this.

Mr. COOMBS. I can find a hundred of them among merchants in New York.

Mr. MAHON. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to state my position about war claims and the course I intend to pursue so long as I am in Congress, resolutely and persistently. I do not intend to pay a particle of attention to the question whether a claim comes from the North or from the South, or whether it is presented by a Union man or one who is not a Union man. I intend to pass on each one of these claims on its merits according to my best judgment.

In these matters we occupy the position of petit jurors or of trial judges, sitting without a jury. And we should not consider politics or sections of the country. We should honestly and impartially pass on the law and the facts. I want to repeat the statement I made a moment ago that by ordinary diligence and research, there can be found claims to the amount of five to ten billion dollars, more legitimate as claims against the United States Treasury than this one. I know something about claims, and will give you a sample or two. One of my constituents wrote me about this sort of case. He is a man worth $15,000 to $20,000. He and his two brothers were drafted during the war.

Mr. KILGORE. On which side?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course they were drafted on the Union side or they would not be here asking to be reimbursed.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not know about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They paid $500 apiece to get substitutes. This man wrote to me (and he is a friend and client of mine) that he wanted me to introduce a bill to refund to him and his brothers the money that they paid out for substitutes.

I wrote to him and told him that he was of military age during the war; that if he was a Union man it was his duty to be in the Union Army, or if he was a rebel it was his duty to be in the rebel army, and that under either view of the case he had no claim on the United States Treasury for anything.

The men who serve on the Committees on Claims find out a great deal. It has been said that the best way to make a thoroughbred out of a scrub horse is to get him killed by a railroad train. [Laughter.] Now, if you will go down and examine the docket of the Committee on Claims the philosophy of that saying will be fully verified. Nothing swells a claim so much as the fact that it is against the General Government.

Out in New Mexico there was an old woman whose husband was the post carpenter. The commandant gave her permission to sell milk to the soldiers. She gradually accumulated a herd of cattle numbering four or five hundred. They ate up the Government hay which was intended for the horses and mules. The commandant ordered her and her cattle off the Government reservation. Instead of leaving the reservation, she went up on one corner of it, built herself an adobe house that would cost $40 or $50, and her cattle still roved around over the Government reservation.

They again ordered her to get off the reservation, but she would not go. Then the major, or captain, or whoever he was, sent a squad of soldiers up there to put her off in a military suit of ejectment. [Laughter.] When the soldiers arrived at her place it was a rainy, inclement day; and the officer in command, being a tenderhearted fellow, would not put the family and the furniture out in the rain. The next day when he went back the sun was shining so he put them out as carefully as he could, tore down the shanty, and went off. Now she comes in asking the United States Government to give her $25,000 on the theory that the destruction of that house scattered her herd of cattle to the four winds, and she had never been able to get them together again. [Laughter.] With just such monstrous claims as this the docket of the Committee on Claims is rammed and jammed.

Now, I want to say this about the way the Government runs its business: it will not pay an honest claim if it can help it; and the man who has a bogus claim, if he will hang around the committees and "bedevil" them sufficiently, is just as apt to get a favorable report finally as the man who has a good claim.

Now, as to the present claim, I do not know whether this man was a Union man or not; I do not care; I do not care whether he votes the Democratic ticket or the Republican ticket; I do not care except that if he votes the Democratic ticket it would show that he has a good deal more sense than if he voted the Republican ticket. [Laughter.]

But let us see what kind of a fix he is in. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] I do not think has stated the matter correctly. The general law was that he should pay, like all other persons, this tariff tax at the custom-house.

Mr. MAHON. Well, he had no tariff tax to pay. Now, the gentleman from Missouri asserts that to be the law. I ask him to prove it, and if he will furnish the proof of that fact I will undertake to withdraw the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, the general law is that every American citizen who imports goods from abroad must pay his customs duties at the custom-house.

Mr. MAHON. These were not imported by him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, as I understand it, by virtue of and in consideration of the fact that these sutlers were selling their goods to the troops in the field, therefore by an order of the Secretary of War——

Mr. SNODGRASS. By a regulation of the Treasury Department, not the law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri (continuing). By a regulation of the Treasury Department and not by any general law, they were allowed to sell them with a certain rebate——

Mr. MAHON. But the gentleman from Missouri does not state the case correctly. The fact of the matter is that this party was not an importer. He had been duly recognized as a sutler, and the party from whom he purchased the goods had undoubtedly compiled with all the regulations and the requirements of the law as to the tariff tax. This man had complied with all of the regulations of the Department——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If my friend will let me proceed, I was going on to say that he had, as the gentleman states, this privilege under a regulation of the Department. Now, in the second place, this man paid that tariff tax without protest.

Mr. KILGORE. Under the regulations.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Under the regulations of the Department. It is the law of the land, declared, I believe, by the supreme court of every State of the Union—I know it is by the Missouri supreme court, for I am familiar with that—that where a man pays a license fee or a tax without protest, it is held to be a voluntary payment on his part, and he can not get it back. He can not plead ignorance of the law. Nobody can do that.

I will tell you how far the supreme court of Missouri has carried this principle in a test case. Some man up at Kansas City that owned lots 1 and 2, for instance, in block A, went to the collector and paid the tax on lots 1 and 2 in block B, supposing that they were his, and afterwards found that he had made a mistake. He went to the collector and demanded the money back. The collector refused to refund it. He sued the collector, and the supreme court held that he could not get the money back; that it was none of the collector's business to inquire who it was paid the tax on lots 1 and 2 in block B; that it was his duty to collect the tax; that it had been collected, the money had been paid over to him, and that was the end of it so far as he was concerned.

Mr. KILGORE. He paid it voluntarily.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; that was the holding of the court, and that is a principle you can not get away from. Every man must exercise ordinary good sense and ordinary caution in all dealings of this character.

Let us see still another thing about this. The sutler pays his tariff duties—my honest opinion is that every man who pays them ought to protest before he pays the tariff tax—but at all events this sutler paid the duties required by law.

Mr. MAHON. If the gentleman will permit me a moment. If the goods had been imported into this country from other countries, the payment of the tax would have been right and proper; but the Government did not collect taxes on coastwise trade, that is, on goods going from one State into another. If the goods had come from other countries, and had been imported under our tariff laws, they would have been required to have paid the tax; but the gentleman must know that there is no tariff duty or tax on goods which are transported in our coastwise trade from one part of the country to another. That is exactly the case here, and there was no authority on the part of the Government to collect this tax.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question while he is up. Is there anything before your committee, or in the report of the committee, or in the archives of the Committee on War Claims, to show that these goods were brought in in the coastwise trade, and that they were not foreign importations?

Mr. HAHON. I will answer this, that this gentleman was not an importer. If he had purchased these goods from abroad and imported them, the duty would have to be paid by him. But as a matter of fact he did not import the goods, and the inference is natural and proper that the duty had been paid before they came into his hands at all. He was simply a citizen of the United States engaged in business, purchased a lot of goods in one part of the country and took them to another part of the same country under our coastwise laws, and the collector of customs demanded from him that he should pay a tariff tax upon the goods, which was unjust.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do you know that these were simply goods transferred from one part of the country to another?

Mr. MAHON. Because I know that he is not an importer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do you know that?

Mr. MAHON. Why, the report of the collector at Baltimore shows that they did not come from foreign countries into his hands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not object to the gentleman from Missouri opposing this bill, but I do object to his measuring this man's oats in somebody's else half bushel. I have stated before that I have examined claims on that committee that I absolutely refused to report because I did not believe they were just.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. MAHON. But I report this case, after a full investigation of it, because I am satisfied that this was an unwarrantable act on the part of the collector. The Government had no right to this money, and the party has a legal and equitable claim against the Government for it. I do not believe that we have a Government so poor that it is necessary to maintain itself by robbing the honest citizen, whether the statute of limitations runs or not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In regard to the statute of limitations, to which reference has been made here, that, let me say, is the rogue's defense, and has been so considered from time immemorial by all honest men. I would not refuse to pay a claim against myself because the statute of limitations ran against it, and I am not in favor of the Government's right to do so on the same ground. But the fact that the claim is not presented within the time that the statute prescribes is a suspicious circumstance against it, and makes the defense of the claim very much easier.

I want to state the remainder of this man's case. He is charged with the customs duties. Of course the foreigner never pays any tax. Nobody ever did believe that proposition except McKinley.

Mr. SNODGRASS. And he has taken it back.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This man paid that tax. Well, now, people in this country do not pay taxes for their health, or for the fun of it. He charged it up as so much added to the cost price of the goods, and charged the soldiers the additional price. If it had not been for the raiding rebels down in Virginia, the soldiers would have paid to that sutler the customs tax that was collected at the port of Baltimore, and we should never have heard of it.

Now, all that there is to tell about it is that, unfortunately for the sutler, Jubal Early or somebody else in gray consumed his supplies, and he lost his profits on them. He took the ordinary fortunes of war and he lost, and I insist that the United States Government and this Congress are under no sort of obligation to come in at this late day and make a profit for him on what turned out at the time to be a losing game.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. I understood you to say that Gen. Early or somebody in the Confederate army got these goods.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. Were they not marked so high that the Confederates would not use them?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They did not pay much attention to prices, Mr. Chairman. They were hungry, and they ate. That is all. They did not care what it cost this sutler.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that this whole business of dealing with the army by the sutlers was under regulations prescribed by the Treasury Department?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. They had to have authority for it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, they had to have a license.

Mr. KILGORE. It was a special privilege?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, did not the Treasury Department have authority to prescribe the conditions, and might not this tax have been imposed as one of the conditions?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It does not make any difference. The Treasury Department relieved him from a part of his load, in order to induce him to sell his goods to the soldiers cheaper. He did not do it. He marked the price up on them, and if the rebels had not got his goods, he would have made $10,000 or $20,000 profit. He happened to meet with a loss, and I insist that he should bear it. There is no merit in this claim.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that it may be some hardship on this claimant, under the peculiar circumstances as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], to refuse to pay this claim, and yet, Mr. Chairman, it would be establishing a very dangerous precedent. I have no doubt, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has said, that there would be millions of claims presented of equal merit. Now, the policy of the Government in the collection of illegal fees, and especially in the collection of illegal duties under the customs laws, is that an importer must protest at the time of payment and take his appeal within the specified time.

I have myself had presented to me claims from my constituents, who have paid excessive duties, sometimes 100 per cent more than the law fixed, but without protest; and I have never been able to get favorably reported a single one of those claims. I think that is the only safe rule that the Government can act upon. The Government does not stand in the same position as an individual. It is well known that the Government officers, faithful and honest as they are, do not guard the interests of the United States as carefully as an individual guards his own interests and protects his own rights, and therefore we should strictly enforce every principle of law and of equity in favor of the Government and against every claimant that comes in claiming to have been injured.

As stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] this is clearly a voluntary payment. I do not believe there is a supreme court in any State in the Union but what has held to the principle enunciated that a payment of an illegal license or tax without protest is a voluntary payment and can not be recovered.

Mr. MCNAGNY. I should like to ask the gentleman whether that doctrine of estoppel applies where payment has been made pursuant to a pure mistake of fact and not of law—whether or not the payment must not be made in ignorance of the law rather than in ignorance of the fact?

Mr. BYNUM. I would not undertake to state exactly whether there is that distinction in cases of this kind. I do not remember that such a distinction was drawn in the decisions I have in mind. There are cases, of course, where there is a distinction between a mistake of fact and a mistake of law, but here there could be no mistake of fact, because it is purely a mistake of rights under the law.

Now, the gentleman will recollect that in Indiana the towns of the State at one time, without any authority, passed an ordinance collecting a license from retail liquor-dealers, and the retail liquor-dealers paid that license. They paid it without protest. One, however, protested and went to the supreme court, and the supreme court held that there was no law authorizing the town to collect this license, but those who had paid without protest were without any remedy.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 6373) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 6080) granting a certain military reservation to Oklahoma City, Okla., to aid the public free schools thereof, and and for other purposes; and

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 67) for the erection of a statue of Francis E. Spinner at the Treasury Department building, Washington; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of moving to nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the fortification appropriation bill.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2717) and had come to no resolution thereon.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the fortification bill, and that the House ask for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I also ask for the appointment of conferees, and that the bill, with Senate amendments, be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4858) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance, for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, without reading them, to this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The amendments will be printed, a conference will be asked, and the following conferees are announced on the part of the House: Mr. WASHINGTON, Mr. SAYERS, and Mr. BINGHAM.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the army appropriation bill; and I also ask for a conference and the appointment of conferees, and that the bill be printed with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6373) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the House will nonconcur in the Senate amendments without reading them, and the Chair will announce the appointment of the following conferees: Mr. OUTHWAITE, Mr. LAPHAM, and Mr. HILL.

The bill with Senate amendments will be printed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5482) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same.

JOSEPH H. O'NEIL,
J. R. WILLIAMS,
HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

CALVIN S. BRICE,
S. M. CULLOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the pension appropriation bill, H. R. 5482, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended by the committee of conference on each of the amendments of the Senate in the accompanying report, namely:

On amendment numbered 1: Strikes from the bill the provision proposed by the Senate amending the act of December 21, 1893, providing that any pension heretofore, or that may hereafter be granted to any applicant shall be deemed and held by all officers of the United States to be a vested right in the grantee to the extent that payment thereof shall not be withheld or suspended until after due notice to the grantee of not less than thirty days.

On amendment numbered 2: Restores to the bill the provision proposed to be stricken out by the Senate, requiring that the report of the examining surgeons, when filed in the Pension Office, shall be open to the examination and inspection of claimants or their attorneys, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide.

On amendment numbered 3: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate vesting the appointment of clerks to sign official checks in the pension agents, and fixing the compensation of such clerks at the rates paid during the fiscal year 1894.

The bill as finally agreed upon appropriates $151,581,570, being the same amount as passed by the House.

JOS. H. O'NEIL,
J. R. WILLIAMS,
HENRY H. BINGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I hope the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House will make an explanation to the House of the effect of the agreement of the conferees. I did not gather from the reading of the report what the effect of the agreement is.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the House in December, last year, passed an act declaring a pension to be a vested right. The Senate, in the pension appropriation bill, offered an amendment to that act. They have receded from their amendment, which leaves the law as it was passed in December, 1893.

Mr. ENLOE. The conferees have agreed to recede.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. The conferees agreed to recede.

The second Senate amendment to the bill was to an amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota in the House, allowing applicants for pension to get a copy of the report of the examining surgeon in their cases. The House provision required that report to be gotten from the Pension Bureau.

The Senate amended that, requiring the medical examiner at the time he made his examination to give to the applicant a copy of that report at the time of his examination. The Senate receded from their action in that respect and adopted the House amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. So that the applicant can now, on request, get a copy of the medical examination.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. From the Pension Department.

The third Senate amendment, to which the House conferees agreed, was an amendment which allows the pension agent to select without let or hindrance a particular personal clerk whom he desires to sign checks for him. The conferees thought that was a proper amendment. And the conferees were unanimous in their report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no objection, then, to the adoption of the report.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6373) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. COCKRELL, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amenements to the bill (H. R. 4858) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. CALL, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. HALE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE M'ALPIN.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session (Mr. DOCKERY in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2717) for the relief of George McAlpin, to repay to him moneys unlawfully collected from him by the United States.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I think the rule of law for which we are contending obtains in every State of the Union. While under ordinary circumstances I would not insist that the rule should be applied, because I think that in some cases payments should be made which, though not recoverable at law, ought to be repaid in equity, yet taking into consideration the lapse of time that has occurred since this case arose, and of the business in which this claimant was engaged, with its incentive to speculation, and in view of the fact that he no doubt added the amount of the tax to the price of the goods, and that the sole loss arose by reason of the incidents of the war, these circumstances, I believe, should exclude this case from favorable consideration at the hands of this committee.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. MAHON], who has charge of this bill, was obliged to leave the hall, being called out of the city, and he asked me to make a single statement in reference to the bill.

Now, let there be no misapprehension. There is no question here of import duties; there is no question of customs involved in this case at all. The simple fact was that this man paid a percentage on goods shipped by himself to himself through the port of Baltimore to other coastwise ports; and that this fee, at first 5 per cent, was imposed by a regulation of the Treasury Department simply on goods that were shipped through the lines into the army; that that 5 per cent was afterward reduced to 3 per cent; that this man paid this imposition of 3 per cent on goods shipped into the lines of the army, amounting to $6,000; that under the law, he being a sutler regularly commissioned, was exempt from that duty. He paid this percentage (which he was not by law required to pay), not on goods imported but simply on goods passing through the custom-house at Baltimore to Aquia Creek, Fortress Monroe, and other points.

There is no question about the facts. But it is alleged that because he made this payment voluntarily, which he was no, required by law to make, it should not be refunded to him. The fact that the payment was voluntary and that it was made without protest might possibly bar him from any legal right to enforce recovery; but it does not bar the United States from voluntarily refunding this money which the Government improperly and unjustly received; and it is the purport of this bill to give such relief.

There is no possible dispute that this man paid this money illegally, without any requirement of law that he should pay it. There is no evidence that he knew at the time the wrong to which he was subjected, or that he protested. But the fact that he did not protest does not alter the illegality or injustice of the payment, and does not preclude the United States from doing him justice and voluntarily refunding to him this money to which it had no claim. To make such repayment is the whole purpose of this bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that general debate now close.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts). The gentleman from California asks that general debate be now closed on this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill was then read.

Mr. LOUD. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The question being taken, there were on a division (called for by Mr. CHARLES W. STONE)—ayes 51, noes 12.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I was requested by my colleague [Mr. MAHON] to ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, tellers will be ordered; and the Chair appoints the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that tellers have not been ordered.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. There was no quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But that point was not made, and the question was not put to the Committee of the Whole on ordering tellers.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] stated before he left the House, as I understood him, that he would not fight this case upon the question of a quorum.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. My colleague stated that he desired tellers; that is all; and I am simply carrying out his request.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But the demand for tellers must be seconded by sufficient number.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. For the purpose of securing a count by tellers, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee and others. Too late.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. As a quorum did not vote, I submit that I am entitled to tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, it is too late now to make the point of no quorum. The ayes have it, and the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is agreed to. The bill is laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

W. B. MORROW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1309) for the relief of W. B. Morrow.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to pay to W. B. Morrow the sum of $4,078.55, for Quartermaster's and Subsistence stores taken from him and used by the troops of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report accompanying this bill.

The report (by Mr. COOPER of Texas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1309) for the relief of W. B. Morrow, reports as follows:

"This claim was presented in the Fifty-second Congress, and was favorably reported upon by the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives, to whom it was referred. After a careful investigation of the facts involved, your committee adopt the report of the committee of the Fifty-second Congress, a copy thereof being hereto attached and made a part of this report."

This claim was never presented to the Quartermaster-General for adjudication under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, for the reason that the claimant removed to the State of Texas shortly after the taking of his property, and was ignorant of the passage of the act of July 4, 1864, requiring claimants to file their claims in the Quartermaster-General's Office.

Your committee report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 222, Fifty-second Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William B. Morrow, submit the following report:

This measure was considered by this committee during the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, and was reported upon favorably, which report is appended as a part of this report.

Your committee concur in the conclusions stated in that report, and report herewith a bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 893, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2130) for the relief of W. B. Morrow, report as follows:

Your committee adopt the report hereto annexed, made by the Committee on War Claims of the Fiftieth Congress, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[Fiftieth Congress, second session. House Report No. 3824.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2331) for the relief of William B. Morrow, respectfully report:

That the claim is for stores and supplies taken from the claimant by the Army of the United States during the late war. Claim stated at $4,078.55.

It appears from the proof submitted that in September, 1862, United States troops took from the claimant's plantation, in Hardeman County, Tenn., for the use of the Army, quartermaster's stores and commissary supplies of the value of $4,078.55; that the claimant was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States.

Your committee are of opinion that the account is correct and just, and that the stores and supplies were taken as charged; that he has not received pay or compensation therefor from any source, either in whole or in part, but that the same is still due and owing to him from the United States, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. COOMBS. I would like to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill why it has never come before the Court of Claims?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I would like to be permitted to make a brief explanation of this bill, and think I can satisfy the gentleman as to the inquiry he has made.

This bill was introduced by myself in behalf of W. B. Morrow, now a citizen of Robertson County, Tex., but at the time the claim accrued he was a citizen of West Tennessee.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there are three questions to be considered in connection with the matter: First, the loyalty of the claimant; second, the justice of the claim itself; and third, whether the claimant has been guilty of such neglect in enforcing his rights as to justify Congress in refusing to pay the claim.

Now, in regard to the first question, that of loyalty. His loyalty during the war at all times, from the beginning to the end of the war, was attested by the officers of all the Union troops in that section of the country and by all of his neighbors and friends.

The committee has on file, written at the time, certificates of loyalty from Maj. Gen. Hurlbut, from W. H. Graves, colonel commanding the Twelfth Michigan Infantry; from J. L. Gaston, captain of the Sixty-second Illinois Infantry; from the provost-marshals and from fifteen or twenty other Union officers who were commanding in Tennessee from time to time, and who certify to the facts in connection with this claimant. There are also certificates from the postmasters, from the county and district clerks, and the oaths of his neighbors as well as those of his former slaves. No man's loyalty at all times could be better attested than was his.

The committee had before it also his oath of allegiance taken when the Union troops entered Tennessee; and in addition to that his oath taken at the close of the war. All of the evidence convinced the committee thoroughly without misgiving that he was at all times loyal to the United States. That is as to the first question.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. Now, if this man was so undeniably loyal all of that time, how did it happen that he had to have a bushel basketful of certificates to that effect? What was the occasion for all of the certification on that subject?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I will explain to the gentleman so that I think he will understand it. It was in this way: There were Union troops in a number of places in West Tennessee. In order to avoid being arrested in going from one place to another, he had certificates of loyalty from the officers in command. He had permission from Gen. Hurlbut, for instance, to trade in Memphis.

Mr. RAY. He was a trader, was he?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. No, not exactly; he purchased articles for his family and neighbors. He lived some 50 miles from Memphis——

Mr. RAY. What was his business?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. He went there—to Memphis—to get coffee and sugar and other supplies for himself and his neighbors.

Mr. RAY. But what was his business?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. He was a doctor.

Mr. RAY. And also a trader or a farmer?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. He was a doctor and a farmer.

Mr. RAY. And went back and forth to get supplies for himself and neighbors?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. How many different certificates of loyalty had he?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. He had certificates of loyalty from the various provost-marshals who were stationed there from time to time. In the first place, it must be remembered that there were a number of different provost-marshals in his town. The certificates that he had from these officials permitted him to go where he pleased and return without difficulty. He had also the certificate from Gen. Hurlbut which permitted him to go to trade in Memphis.

Mr. RAY. Have you Gen. Hurlbut's certificate?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I have not the certificate at hand; I will send for it, however, if the gentleman desires to see it. If the Clerk will call for the papers in connection with House bill 1309, on file in the Clerk's office, this certificate will be found on file amongst them.

Mr. LOUD. What was the character of the goods and supplies furnished?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I will mention that as I proceed.

Mr. LOUD. It ought to have been in the evidence in the case submitted with the report.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. It is in the evidence, and as I was going on to say——

Mr. LOUD. But it ought to have been published in the report.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. It was in evidence, but I do not understand that these things are necessarily published in the reports. They are all in the papers, however, which accompany the claim.

I was going on to tell the gentleman that these supplies consisted of corn, fodder, oats, bacon, and in fact all things raised on a farm. He received for them vouchers signed by the Federal officers for almost all that he furnished them.

Mr. LOUD. He never entered the Union Army?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. No, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Then was not this a fair contribution, to substantiate his unquestioned loyalty to the cause?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I do not know about that, because I suppose if, as the Government has done in other cases where loyal men lost property, they were allowed compensation for it, the same rule should apply here. It would seem to be only a matter of justice to him to treat him as others have been treated under like circumstances.

Now, as to the propriety of paying any of these claims originally, I do not propose to discuss that. I simply say that these claims are being paid, that this man was thoroughly loyal, that this claim is just if there ever has been a just claim of that character before this House.

Mr. COOMBS. I understand there are other bills here?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. As I say, these vouchers are on file in almost every instance. There are perhaps some two or three instances where the troops were in such a hurry, pursuing the Confederates or being pursued by the Confederates, that they could not give vouchers. In those cases the facts are attested by the oath of his neighbors. The account is filed and attested in that way.

Mr. COOMBS. Is this claim simply for the amount that he did not have vouchers for?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. This is for the amount that he did have vouchers for, and the others as well. It amounts to about $4,078, including everything.

Now, in regard to the length of time that has elapsed, this gentleman moved to Roberts County, Tex., after the war, his moveable property having been largely contributed to the Union cause, his fences burned, his house destroyed, and nothing left but his land. He went out and settled in the post oaks of Roberts County. Our mails were few and far between. He knew nothing of the laws of the United States. The people there knew nothing of this law.

Perhaps not one lawyer in a hundred in the State of Texas knew that there was any law upon the statute books under which he could file his claim and get his money from the Quartermaster-General. But, Mr. Chairman, as soon as he had an opportunity, as soon as Texas had been reconstructed, he filed his claim with Congress. He put in his petition in 1873. It has been here ever since. It has never been changed in the slightest degree.

Mr. RAY. How many times has it been reported upon?

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. It has been reported upon, I think, by every Congress from the Forty-ninth. It was passed through this House in the Fifty-second Congress. It went to the Senate and was passed there, and returned here with an amendment on the 3d day of March, 1893, too late to be concurred in.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the condition of the claim. It passed both the House and the Senate, but came back here with an amendment, and there was not time to appoint conferees or to get it up for concurrence. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think this man is entitled to ask consideration from this House, in a Congress that claims to love the American Union and claims to appreciate the sacrifices that were made by her soldiers and by her adherents during the war.

I was on the Southern side of this question. Though young, I was in the Southern army. There were in the South a set of human buzzards who joined the Federal Army as it came along for purposes of plunder, for purposes of revenge. But when a man was a Union man, as Dr. Morrow was, from conviction and from patriotism, and when he risked social ostracism, fortune, and even life itself, to sustain his convictions, I think he should have fair treatment from this House, and I believe that this House ought to and will do him justice.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if this class of claims is to be paid in a general way, if we are to enter upon the payment of this class of war claims, I do not know but we might as well open the door with this one as any other claim, but I want to state a few facts in this connection.

Mr. DOCKERY. If this House proposes to establish a precedent by paying this class of claims, I will state that Missouri can furnish at least three or four millions of just as good claims as this.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I think they would be furnished by gentlemen who were so loyal that they staid in Missouri, and had a great deal to do with Missouri staying in the Union besides.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. This gentleman staid in the State of Tennessee until the close of the war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the report does not say so. As I recollect it—and I have some recollection about it—the war closed in 1865.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. This gentleman moved to Texas in 1866.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The statement here is that the claim was never presented to the Quartermaster-General, under the act of July 4, 1864, for the reason that the claimant removed to the State of Texas shortly after the taking of his property——

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. It ought to be shortly after the close of the war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have got the bill. I can not readjust this bill to suit the emergency. [Continuing] and was ignorant of the passage of the act of July 4, 1864; and the gentleman from Texas tells us that the reason why he did not know of the passage of the act of 1864 was because he settled in a wild part of Texas, where the mails only came occasionally.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. What I want to know is if going to Texas would deprive people of all intelligence of what is going on in the whole of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My observation is that the people of Texas were pretty tolerably wide-awake as to what was going on about that time.

But let us see what there is in this. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] said that he could count on the fingers of one hand the loyal men in any community throughout the South during the war.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement? He must have had a great many fingers if he could have counted all the loyal men in the section where I live, which furnished 35,000 soldiers to the Federal Army.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They came from a very peculiar portion of Tennessee. I know all about that, and they were loyal men, and no doubt the statement of Governor SAYERS was a little——

Mr. SNODGRASS. It shows what this kind of statement about being able to count on the fingers of one hand is worth.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it is an exaggeration myself; but it appears that this gentleman, according to the gentleman's own statement, was loyal. What was he doing? The mere fact that he was allowed to go to Memphis and allowed to buy sugar and coffee is not proof of loyalty.

There were thousands of men as totally disloyal as any other men in the South, who, when our armies came there, were allowed to go within the lines to buy and trade upon their honor that they would be governed by the principles of war; and I never knew one of them to violate their parole in that behalf. The fact that the provost guard was allowed to pass this gentleman does not prove anything. The question of loyalty is here. What did he do? What was his action? What was his declaration? What was his conduct during the war? It was a very suspicious circumstance, and I hope that the gentleman from Texas will not cavil at the statement I am now going to make—that he should have lived in the most disloyal part of Tennessee (I do not use that term in the offensive sense), the western portion of Tennessee, where substantially all white men were involved in opposition to the Government. Then, during the war and long before Appomattox, he moved away to Texas. Texas was absolutely——

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I want to correct the gentleman. Whatever the report may say, he did not move to Texas until after the war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman knows more about it than I.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I say that he did not move to Texas until after the war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What I am speaking from is the bill itself and report.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. The gentleman would not make an argument on a statement which is incorrect.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman has not sought to amend his bill in any way.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I considered that unnecessary; that it was not a substantial matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will take the gentleman's statement as conclusive, and that is certainly all he can ask. What was this man doing?

But I have come to another branch of this question, Mr. Chairman, and I hope the House will act very intelligently now upon that.

The bar of the statute of limitation began against this claimant. The answer to it is ignorance of the law. Now, then, if that defense is to be admitted here, why you might as well repeal that great principle of law. I think I can give it to you in plain English and possibly can give it in something else. Ignorantia legis non excusat is a principle of law that has never yet been varied from and never ought to be varied from.

Now, just see what we have got here. We have got simply the statement of the claimant himself, and I call my friend's attention to the fact that you could never have any other proof, the mere statement of the claimant himself that he did not know of the statute of 1864.

Why, sir, you can not prove in any case that the person knows of the existence of a statute. The statute is passed and put upon the statute book; and the loyal people of the country are charged with notice of it.

This man comes here and says that he did not know of this law. To allow such a plea would repeal every statute of limitations—would repeal the bar to the influx of all claims of this character upon Congress. I close where I began, by saying that if this House of Representatives wants to enter upon this broad field, here is a precedent that can readily be set that will come home to plague us to the extent of a great many million dollars.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to oppose this claim, after the very eloquent address of the gentleman from Texas, but it strikes me that we can not consistently vote in favor of it for several reasons. In the first place, this man is said to be a very intelligent man. He is not an ignorant, illiterate man, unacquainted with the status of matters in this country. Now, he allows this claim to drift on for twenty-five years before presenting it to the Government. He does not take advantage of the facilities that the Government has given him for the establishment of his claim in the Court of Claims. Now, at this late day we are asked to put him in a better position than men who submitted their claims in due time to that court. It is well known that the Court of Claims investigates in these cases not only the quantity, but the value of the property in question.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. COOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. The gentleman says that this man waited for twenty-five years before presenting his claim.

Mr. COOMBS. Well, he waited for a long time.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. He waited until 1873, just eight years after the war, when he presented his claim to Congress; and it has been here ever since.

Mr. COOMBS. At all events, he did not put in his claim either under the original law or under the act extending the time. It strikes me that to permit him now to come in and establish his claim before a committee of Congress, where witnesses are not examined, would put him above claimants who have submitted their claims to the consideration of the Court of Claims.

Mr. SNODGRASS. There are vouchers for most of these claims.

Mr. COOMBS. I understand that; but I have been familiar with matters of this kind; and I know that the Court of Claims in such cases frequently cuts down the amounts appearing in the vouchers. I should have no objection to a reference of this matter to the Court of Claims for investigation. But I think it ought not to be put on a higher plane than the claims of men who complied with the law and submitted their cases to the examination of the court.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Now, let us have a vote.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I will occupy only a few minutes. I want to direct attention to some of the papers in this case. Here is a paper dated La Grange, Tenn., September 8, 1863.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I suggest to the gentleman that the Committee of the Whole are satisfied in regard to the facts.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. This is, in regard to the question of loyalty.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Everybody is satisfied with your statement about that.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. Then I will say no more.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. PENDLETON of Texas. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 33, noes 20.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. PENDLETON of Texas were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being insisted upon, as the Chair understands, the Clerk under the rule will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, but was interrupted by——

Mr. ENLOE. I ask unanimous consent that the further call of the roll be dispensed with. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is willing to withdraw the point of no quorum, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PENDLETON] is willing to agree that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. COOMBS. But let it be understood that the bill is still open to discussion.

Mr. ENLOE. This arrangement will leave it entirely open.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the further call of the roll be dispensed with, that the point of no quorum be withdrawn, and the bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I object.

The Clerk resumed and completed the call of the roll.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request that the order for the call of the roll be vacated, with the understanding that the point of no quorum is to be withdrawn by the gentleman from Ohio, and the bill of the gentleman from Texas be withdrawn from consideration, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again submit the request to the House.

Is there objection?

There was no objection; consequently the roll call was vacated, the point of no quorum withdrawn, and the bill passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

CATHERINE CAINE.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 952) for the relief of Catherine Caine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Catherine Caine, widow of the late Rev. Charles Caine, the pay and allowances of a chaplain in the volunteer service, from the 10th day of December, 1861, to March, 1863, the said Charles Caine having served as such chaplain in the organization known as Yates's Sharpshooters, Illinois Volunteers, during the time mentioned, under a commission issued by Richard Yates, governor of the State of Illinois, without pay.

The committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out of line 8 the words "tenth" and "December," and inserting "first" and "January;" and in line 9, strike out the words "sixty-one," "March," and "sixty-three," and insert "sixty-two," "August," and "sixty-two," so as to allow pay from January 1, 1862, to August 1, 1862; and when so amended, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims of the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses reported favorably bills substantially like the present bill. The governor of Illinois commissioned Rev. Charles Caine to be chaplain of a military organization designated as "Yates's Sharpshooters," which afterwards became the Sixty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry. Rev. Charles Caine served as chaplain of said organization from January 1, 1862, to July 31, 1862. But he received no pay because there were only six companies of "Yates's Sharpshooters," and the paymaster declined to pay him on the ground that such number of companies were not entitled to a chaplain.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I will make a brief explanation of the facts in this case.

During the war there was organized in the State of Illinois a body of men—a military organization—known as the "Yates Sharpshooters," composed of six companies. This gentleman, whose widow is the beneficiary of this bill, was a preacher in the county in which I reside, and was appointed and commissioned by the governor of Illinois as the chaplain of this organization of soldiers and went into the service and served for the time stated in the bill and report.

Mr. COOMBS. In actual service?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. In actual service. It seems, however, that under the law there was not a sufficient number of men in the command to entitle it to the services of a chaplain. This man, though, having received a commission from the governor of the State, left his charge, gave up his salary and his home, furnished himself with a proper outfit and uniform of an officer of the Army, went into the service, and actually served at his own expense for the number of months specified.

This bill simply provides that the widow shall be paid for the time he actually served.

Mr. COOMBS. What is the amount?

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. About $700, I think.

This bill was passed by unanimous consent in the last Congress and went to the Senate; but was not acted upon there, I suppose, for want of time. He was a good man, and his aged widow, the beneficiary of the bill, is left without means of support in her old age.

I move that the bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM JOHNSON, ADMINISTRATOR.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 722) for the relief of William Johnson, administrator of Thomas I. Johnson, deceased, of Fayette County, Tenn., as found due by the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to William Johnson, administrator of Thomas I. Johnson, deceased, of Fayette County, Tenn., the sum of $13,378 for stores and supplies taken by the United States Army, as found due by the Court of Claims under the act of Congress "to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883.

The report (by Mr. ENLOE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 722) for the relief of William Johnson, administrator of Thomas I. Johnson, deceased, of Fayette County, Tenn., as found due by the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883, reports as follows:

That this claim was referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the provisions of the act known as the "Bowman act," approved March 3, 1883.

Said claim has been returned with a report and findings, which are as follows:

[Court of Claims. Congressional—Facts and loyalty. No. 3614. William Johnson, administrator of Thomas I. Johnson, deceased, vs. United States.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

The claim in the above-entitled case for supplies or stores alleged to have been taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion was transmitted to the court by the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives on the 10th day of April, 1888.

Gilbert Moyers, esq., appeared for claimant, and the Attorney-General, by J. H. Nixon, esq., his assistant, and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

On a preliminary inquiry the court, on the 23d day of May, 1892, found that the person alleged to have furnished the supplies or stores, or from whom they were alleged to have been taken, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war.

The case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the 13th day of October, 1892. The claimant in his petition makes the following allegations:

That he is a citizen of the United States, residing in Fayette County, State of Tennessee, where decedent resided during the late war of the rebellion; that at different times during said period the United States forces, by proper authority, took from the decedent quartermaster stores and commissary supplies of the value of $22,387.75, and appropriated the same to the use of the United States Army, as follows:

17 mules and 4 horses, in all 21 head of stock, at $150 per head	$3,150.00
900 cords of wood	1,950.00
19,000 pounds of fodder, receipted for, at $2 per hundred	380.00
503,000 feet of lumber, at $20 per M	10,060.00
July, 1862:
1 set blacksmith tools and shop, complete	200.00
30 bushels oats, at $1	30.00
2,540 bushels corn, at $1	2,540.00
1 heavy iron-axle wagon	100.00
16,500 pounds fresh pork, at 10 cents	1,650.00
7,000 pounds of beef, at 7 cents	700.00
200 bushels of potatoes, at $1	200.00
3 barrels of flour, at $12 per barrel	36.00
5 barrels of molasses, 210 gallons, at $1	210.00
290 pounds sugar, at 20 cents	58.00
5,120 pounds cured meat, at 20 cents	1,024.00
100 pounds of sausage meat, at 25 cents	25.00
100 pounds mackerel, at 10 cents	10.00
200 pounds dried beef, at 25 cents	50.00
20 pounds lard, at 15 cents	3.00
5 bushels peas, at $2	10.00
3 bushels corn meal, at $1.25 per bushel	3.75
Aggregating in value	22,389.75

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following.

FINDINGS OF FACTS:

I. That during the war of the rebellion there was taken from the claimant, now deceased, Thomas I. Johnson, by proper military authority, for the use of the United States Army, stores and supplies amounting in value to the sum of $13,378.

II. That no payment appears to have been made for said stores and supplies.

BY THE COURT.

Filed October 10, 1892.
A true copy.
Test, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1892.
[SEAL.]
JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk, Court of Claims.

Your committee, therefore, report the accompanying bill for the payment of the amount found due by the Court of Claims, and recommend its passage.

Mr. ENLOE. I move that this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I move, if a substitute for that motion is in order——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts). The Chair recognizes the gentleman to move a substitute.

Mr. RAY. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York why he makes that motion?

Mr. RAY. I make it because in the first place I do not believe this is a just or proper claim to be allowed or paid; and again, it is one of that class of claims that we considered the other day and discussed in the House, a class of claims I do not think were properly looked after in the interest of the Government by the Attorney-General when they were pending.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask if the gentleman from New York means to impeach ex-Attorney-General Miller by that declaration, who was a member of his own political party, and a very distinguished lawyer? Does the gentleman mean to say or insinuate that he did not properly attend to his official duties?

Mr. RAY. I make no such charge, and however that may be he was charged with a duty and gentlemen on the other side of the House said a few days since—and voted deliberately—that a certain number of claims of this character, or I think they were Indian depredation claims, had not been taken care of as far as the interests of the Government were concerned. That having been declared by your side of the House, I think I am bound to believe that statement to be true as to these claims which to me appear wrong and illegal.

But I am opposed to the claim, and make the motion for that reason.

Mr. ENLOE. I understand the gentleman is opposed to the claim; but what I am trying to find out is on what ground he opposes it, why he makes the motion he does, or if in fact he knows anything about it.

Mr. RAY. Well, I heard the report read, the report and the findings of the Court of Claims. Now, I heard here a few minutes ago a gentleman on that side of the House, speaking in regard to this class of claims, make the statement that millions of dollars of such claims could be found in his State alone, if the Government was to enter upon the policy of paying them. You would bankrupt the Treasury of the United States within the next three months if you enter upon this system of legislatson and pay all the claims of this class that will be brought forward.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not understand the gentleman yet, Mr. Chairman. If the gentleman means to say that he is opposed to the payment of any of these claims, when the Court of Claims has made an investigation and has ascertained the loyalty of the claimant, and has ascertained the value of the property taken, and that it was used by the United States Government, I want him to so declare. If he is attacking this claim because he knows of some reason why this particular claim should not pass, then I want to know what his objection is.

If I am to understand that he takes the broad ground that Congress ought not to appropriate any money to pay these claims after the Court of Claims has found the claimant loyal, and found that the Government took the property, and that this is a proper valuation of the articles taken, then I shall understand his position distinctly. But at present I do not understand his objection.

Mr. RAY. I have told the gentleman that my objection is that I do not believe this to be a just and proper claim.

Mr. PATTERSON. Why do you not? That is the question.

Mr. RAY. Because I have seen no evidence that satisfies me that it is just or proper, or that it is a claim that ought to be paid. I think, in the first instance, the fact that these claims have been dormant and unacted upon for a period of thirty years ought to settle the question of their justice and validity.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Have you reviewed the action of the Court of Claims?

Mr. RAY. I have had no opportunity.

Mr. SNODGRASS. The case has been here for months and months. If you propose to constitute yourself a tribunal of review, you ought to read the proceedings.

Mr. RAY. This is the first time I have heard of this case. If the Congress of the United States is to pay any attention to the action of the Court of Claims, then it ought to enact a law providing that these matters shall be referred to the Court of Claims for investigation——

Mr. ENLOE. That is what it has done.

Mr. RAY. That court to make findings of facts and conclusions of law——

Mr. ENLOE. That is what it has done as to the facts. The conclusions of law are inevitable.

Mr. RAY. That court to pronounce a judgment; and then it ought to be made obligatory upon the Treasury of the United States to pay those judgments without any further action on the part of Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why is it that the law is in the condition it is to-day on this subject? Simply because the Congress of the United States dare not, and does not trust to the adjudications of the Court of Claims. They are all reported here, and then Congress either appropriates the money to pay them or does not, according as it thinks each claim is just and deserving or unjust and undeserving. Therefore, that being the condition of the law on the subject, the right is reserved to this Congress, and to each member of this House to act in these matters as he thinks proper and right.

Mr. ENLOE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question there.

Mr. RAY. Yes.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to know, if a bill were proposed here to authorize the Court of Claims to render final judgments in cases of this character, if the gentleman would vote for it?

Mr. RAY. Establishing in the first place a proper court, organized in the proper way?

Mr. ENLOE. I am talking about this court, and so are you. You are discussing this court, and saying what this court ought to do. Would you vote for a proposition to authorize this court to render final judgment in these cases, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court?

Mr. RAY. I am not prepared at this moment to say that I would vote for a bill giving to this court, as now organized, the power to pronounce a final judgment; but I do desire to state that I would vote for a bill organizing a court of claims having jurisdiction of all claims against the United States, and giving to that court the power to hear, try, determine, and pronounce final judgment, subject, however, to the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, accompanied with a provision that those judgments should be final and conclusive, and providing that they should be paid out of the money in the Treasury of the United States without further action on the part of Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, would he not be governed somewhat in his answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee, by the aggregate amount of these claims and the question of the ability of the Government, within a reasonable hope of the future, to pay the amount? Would not that cut some figure?

Mr. RAY. Oh, most certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask the gentleman right there——

Mr. RAY (continuing). It should affect the mind and judgment of every man in this House in passing upon these matters.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and I would like the gentleman from Ohio to give me his attention also. I would like to know if the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio propose to establish the principle here that the payment of a claim shall not depend upon its justness and the obligation of the Government to pay, but shall be determined by the amount of the claim against the Government?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the abstract the position of the gentleman from Tennessee is right; but following a great war, we all know that the action of nations have got to be affected materially by the magnitude of the amounts involved in this sort of claim.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he thinks, in the first place, that the payment of an aggregate sum of not more than $2,500,000 would endanger the perpetuity of the Government and probably bring it into bankruptcy?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, Mr. Chairman, not if that could be done. If the gentleman could get into one place, into one court and one suit for damage of $2,500,000, I would be glad to do anything to get out of the constant claims upon the Government that we have here.

Mr. ENLOE. I want the gentleman from New York and I want the gentleman from Ohio to tell the House and the country if they believe that the Government is not able to pay every dollar that it owes to loyal citizens for the property which it took from them for the purpose of carrying on the war when the aggregate amount pending in the Court of Claims is only $25,000,000, and only 8 per cent is the average allowed of these claims, which would make it less than $2,500,000.

I want to know if the gentleman from Ohio thinks that it would be right to refuse payment to loyal citizens who furnished supplies to carry on the war, and if he is going to put the Government in the attitude of being bankrupt and not able to pay its just liabilities of this character when it is able to pay the immense amount of money it is paying annually to pension soldiers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that is one thing and the ravages of war is another. That which takes the form of a debt of the Government, no matter whether in the payment of a contract or liability which results ultimately in an indebtedness, the Government ought to pay regardless of the amount; but when you come to allowing claims for damages to colleges and churches——

Mr. ENLOE. This is not colleges and churches.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are all intimately connected together; and I am discussing the whole subject.

Mr. ENLOE. But you are not discussing this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not speaking on this bill, but it is the system governing the payment of this entire class of claims.

Mr. ENLOE. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: If some institution of learning has a claim against the Government for use of its property, or some church for use and occupation, would he make that a reason why he should refuse to pay a citizen, who has proven his loyalty, for the taking and the use by the Government of his property, by proper authority, and its value? Would you make that a reason for refusing payment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was only discussing the general principle of payment in connection with the statement of the gentleman from New York with reference to all claims of this character, which are largely found, when you come to examine them, to be in the nature of depredations and ravages of war.

Mr. ENLOE. But that is not this claim.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not discussing this claim.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman is discussing the whole subject in opposing this bill; and I am trying to get the House to understand what there is in this bill. This man presented this claim for something over $22,000. The Government investigated it through its attorney, who went upon the ground, examined the witnesses, took the proof, and examined the vouchers for these supplies; and now, after it has made a thorough investigation, the court cuts the amount down $9,000 and reports that there is something over $13,000 due him.

Now, does the gentleman from New York insist that because there are a number of other war claims against the Government, this man should be denied what is due him?

Mr. RAY. The fact that this claim was cut down shows a large element of injustice, and, I might perhaps not inappropriately say, rottenness in connection with the claim.

Now, I desire to yield a moment to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], who, as I understand, wishes to ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE].

Mr. KILGORE. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit.

Mr. ENLOE. I suppose I shall have to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. KILGORE. The whole of the argument of my friend from Tennessee is based upon the theory that this claimant was loyal during the entire war.

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, is there not considerable doubt on that subject? Although the Court of Claims determined that this claimant was loyal, that is not conclusive on this House.

Mr. ENLOE. No.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, is it not true that all through that country those people were loyal to the particular army which at the time occupied the country? That was my experience.

Mr. ENLOE. I have no doubt the gentleman from Texas had a very extensive experience——

Mr. KILGORE. I was in the war along through that section.

Mr. ENLOE. I supposed that you served probably in Texas.

Mr. KILGORE. I served in Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. Did you not find loyal citizens there?

Mr. KILGORE. Powerful few!

Mr. ENLOE. Tennessee furnished thirty-seven regiments to the Federal Army.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that; there is no question about that.

Mr. ENLOE. Then there must have been some loyal citizens there.

Mr. BOATNER. Oh, no; they all went into the army, so that no loyal citizens were left at home!

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman from Texas, as I understand, is suffering from some peculiar mental distortion growing out of the fact that he was in the war and that he comes from a State that had very few loyal citizens during the war. I have no doubt he thinks it was a crime for a man living in that section to be loyal to the United States Government.

Mr. KILGORE. There were more loyal citizens in Texas than in Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. I understand the gentleman from Texas applies his view to Texas, Tennessee, and every other part of the country that went into the secession movement.

Mr. KILGORE. I say that with scarcely an exception, if the people in those sections had been disloyal to the Confederacy when the Confederate army was there, they could not have stayed there; they must have been loyal to whichever army occupied the country. That was my experience there.

Mr. ENLOE. Then the gentleman from Texas believes that if there was an army in his section of the country which represented different opinions from his, he would change his convictions in order to be in sympathy with the "powers that be."

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; I do not believe any such thing.

Mr. ENLOE. Why, the gentleman, according to his own argument, ought to be a Republican under a Republican Administration so as to "stand in" with the authorities.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not think I can well afford to be argued into the Republican party by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir; I do not intend to put you there.

Mr. KILGORE. I can not permit that.

Mr. ENLOE. I know the Republican party would object to that. I am not going to inflict anything of that sort upon them. [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. I was a loyal citizen up to the time that Texas seceded. I was opposed to secession and opposed to the war. But after my State seceded, I went in and did my duty on our side; and I did not lose any reputation as a soldier, either.

Mr. ENLOE. I have no doubt the gentleman made a good soldier, but his argument now is untenable; his position is unfair; his statements are unjust.

Mr. KILGORE. But the proof ought to be conclusive before this House consents to concede——

Mr. ENLOE. I refer you to my colleague on the right, who says your statements are untrue so far as Tennessee is concerned.

Mr. KILGORE. Who is your colleague?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, you are not as big a man as I am. How can you afford to say that? [Laughter.]

Mr. SNODGRASS. I know something about the facts you are talking about.

Mr. KILGORE. I know how it was in my experience.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Well, I happened to be a soldier on the same side that you did; and I know there were thousands of families there who would not have given you or me a piece of corn bread; who had no hesitation in saying they were Union people and loyal to the Government.

Mr. KILGORE. I found such in the mountains of Tennessee and Kentucky, but never in the section of country you are speaking of.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I am speaking of one of the best sections of the State, East Tennessee, and every soldier who went through that part of the country knows that there were thousands of loyal people there, as loyal as the people of Massachusetts or New York.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to know what part of Tennessee the gentleman from Texas has been speaking of.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I was over pretty nearly all the State.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to locate your particular spot.

Mr. KILGORE. I was at Knoxsville, Cumberland Gap, Murfreesboro, Chattanooga, Tullahoma, Shelbyville, Nashville, and all over that country.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, you were not in the section of the State where this man resided.

Mr. KILGORE. This man lived down on the Alabama border?

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir, he did not; he lived in a different portion of the State. He lived in West Tennessee.

Mr. RAY. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BOATNER. I understood the gentleman to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAY. To put a question to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE].

Mr. BOATNER. I understood it was for a speech.

Mr. KILGORE. I will not trespass further on the time of the gentleman.

Mr. BOATNER. Now, will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a question?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOATNER. I want to ask the gentleman if he was sworn as a juror in a case where a man had sued for $20,000 and proved only $9,000, if he would nonsuit him for the whole amount because he had not succeeded in establishing the entire claim?

Mr. RAY. Oh, no.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, that is exactly what you ought to do under the principles laid down in the argument you have just made. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, you say that because he made a claim for $20,000 and proved only $9,000, it was a sufficient ground to warrant the rejection of the whole claim.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman perhaps did not mean that exactly.

Mr. RAY. I did not make any such statement. The gentleman from Louisiana is begging the question when he undertakes to put the matter in that shape.

Mr. BOATNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I was only quoting his argument against himself.

Mr. RAY. Every man here knows that this claim and all claims of the same nature, to have consideration by the Court of Claims, must have the consent of Congress, and is absolutely without foundation in law. That is the point I was making. It could have no standing for a moment in any court. The claimant had his day; he failed to avail himself of it, and now the time for the presentation and enforcement of the claim has gone by, except by consent of Congress.

Mr. ENLOE. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. RAY. Except by the special permission of this House.

Mr. ENLOE. By Congress.

Mr. RAY. By Congress. That is right. Now, the question of loyality and disloyalty has come up here for discussion, and I want to say a few words on that question. In the State of Tennessee during the war, or in Western Tennessee, there were three classes of persons. The large majority of the people sympathized with the rebellion; they believed that the Confederacy was right, and they had the courage of their convictions, and came up manfully and boldly and announced it.

Those who were able to do so joined the Confederate army. For that class of men I have the highest regard, and the highest respect. I believe they, in the main, were just as honest in their convictions as I was when I joined the Union Army, and I respect them accordingly for having the courage of their convictions.

There was another class of men who believed in the Union, and those who were able to do so came out manfully and joined the Union Army, and fought for the integrity of the nation. For those men I have undying gratitude and respect. There was still another class, however, who were neither fish nor flesh——

A MEMBER. Were they fowl?

Mr. RAY. And they did not mean to be the devil; but they were all the same. When the Union Army had possession of the territory in West Tennessee professedly they were Union men; they would play into the hands of the Union Army and would fill their pockets full of certificates that they were loyal men.

They always posed under such circumstances as true and loyal men. But whenever the Confederate army was in control of the same section they would lay away their papers certifying to their Union proclivities and their unquestioned loyalty, and bring forth their certificates of adherence to the Confederacy, and would present them on every occasion when demanded, or when necessity made it expedient for them to do so.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOATNER. Is there any evidence of that character in this case?

Mr. RAY. I have not seen the evidence of that character in this case yet, but I have no doubt it exists.

Mr. BOATNER. Has the Court of Claims found anything of that sort in the evidence submitted with the claim?

Mr. RAY. Why, only a few minutes ago we had under consideration here a claim of almost this precise character, in behalf of a gentleman now residing in the State of Texas, an intelligent man, a physician, and it has been said that he produced evidence on that behalf—that all during the war he was a loyal man in Tennessee, and at the close of the war he did not go farther north; he did not remain in Tennessee, where there was a percentage of Union men, but he pulled up stakes and dug for Texas, where confessedly there were no Union men, and has lived there ever since.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. RAY. Let me finish a little explanation that I was undertaking to give in connection with this Texas case, and then I will yield to the gentleman with the greatest pleasure.

Now, the gentleman advocating that bill that I have just mentioned said that he had abundance of evidence that the man was loyal, absolutely, throughout the entire war. I sent for the papers, by the courtesy of the gentleman having the bill in charge, and looked over them and found that every Union colonel, captain, or general who got into that region gave him a certificate that he had given favors to the Union Army; that they believed him to be loyal, and therefore desired that his person and property should be respected.

Now, he had so many of these certificates from so many different sources that it struck me as a little peculiar, and I hunted them all over because I believed if I had lived in Western Tennessee during that four years of civil strife that everybody would have known, without inquiry or certificates, whether I was loyal or disloyal.

I should not have needed a peck basketful of certificates from this colonel and that general to show my loyalty. But I ran down through the papers and I found that in April or May, 1865, this very man took the general oath of amnesty, promising under oath and in writing that in the future he would be a loyal man, confessing thereby that during the rebellion he had not been loyal. And still a committee of this House have reported, in ignorance of the facts undoubtedly, that that man was loyal during the war and ought now be treated as a loyal man.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, I ask the gentleman from New York if he does not know that under the order of a military governor of Tennessee every citizen, loyal and disloyal, had to take that oath.

Mr. RAY. Had to take that particular oath?

Mr. ENLOE. That particular oath.

Mr. BOATNER. Or get out of the State or go to jail.

Mr. ENLOE. You did not know that, did you?

Mr. RAY. If that is true it is news to me.

Mr. ENLOE. I think a great many things pertaining to this matter which the gentleman is discussing would be news to him, if the facts were communicated to him.

Mr. RAY. That is undoubtedly true. I make no pretense to knowing everything. I know very little, but, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that I do know, and I know it beyond all question or dispute, and I desire to impress that fact upon the mind of the gentleman from Tennessee. I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. ENLOE. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. RAY. And I am opposed to every bill similar in character.

Mr. ENLOE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for defining his position.

Mr. RAY. I may not be able to give, to the gentleman's satisfaction, the reasons why I am opposed, but they are sufficient to satisfy me. They satisfy my mind, and I believe that the Congress of the United States can do no more foolish thing than to enter upon a career of extravagance in appropriating money to pay claims of this class and nature. The gentleman asks me if I would vote against a measure which proposed to do justice to any citizen of the United States.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that there are many measures that I can think of that would do justice to citizens of the United States, that I would vote against. When the war broke out of which we are now speaking, the men of the North were called upon to enlist. They did enlist and went into the Union Army under the solemn promise of the Government of the United States that they should have at first $12 a month, and later on $14, and then $16 per month. The Government of the United States, in its necessities, instead of paying in money worth twelve, fourteen, or sixteen dollars, paid in paper money depreciated in value, a currency not worth at some periods during the war 50 cents on the dollar.

We promised to give the soldiers $16, and we only gave them $8. The war has closed. The Government of the United States has grown rich and prosperous. We could make our promise good to these old soldiers and to their widows and children. We have the ability to do it. We are rich enough to do it. It would be a piece of magnificent justice if we should do it. But if that proposition should be brought before this House to-day, in justice to my country, in justice to all our people, I should be compelled to vote against the measure, not because it would be unjust to the claimants, but because it would be inexpedient and improper, and unjust to the great mass of the citizens of this country under the present condition of things.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have said all I care to say on this subject.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. In the first place, I found out at once that he was opposed to this bill, and I think there is where he started. He was suspicious of the bill on general principles, and he determined to oppose it. But it never had occurred to him to hunt up any reasons why he should oppose it; so after he got on his feet and commenced to make his speech he had to invent the reasons as he went along to justify his position, and he has furnished us with evidence of the fact that while he knows some things very well, yet he thinks he knows a great many things that he does not know about this bill.

I would have supposed from the way he started out to discuss it that he had been in Tennessee during the war and that he was going to tell us what he knew about it from some personal experience, or that he had found something in the record in this case to justify his position. But he can not find anything in this case to justify his position. He does not know anything about what he was talking about as to the condition of things during the war.

He, like many another man has done who wanted to oppose a measure, had to invent as he went his reasons for opposition. He drew upon his imagination for a state of facts and applied it to this particular bill. In the attempt to justify himself he went into the case which was just now before the House, of a citizen who lived in Tennessee and who moved to Texas and subsequently filed a claim against the Government. Then he proceeds as logically in that as in his whole speech to immediately impeach the loyalty of that man because he left Tennessee and went to Texas.

I did not know before that a man lost his reputation for loyalty on account of the State he happened to settle in after the war. But if a man served in the Army from the State of New York, and he went and settled in Texas, according to the gentleman's argument he has proven that he was a traitor to the Government at heart all the while he wore its uniform and fought its battles. Every man from the North, according to the gentleman's logic, who has settled in the State of Texas since the war has furnished overwhelming proof that he was disloyal to the Government during the war because he seeks association with gentlemen like my friend from Texas [Mr. KILGORE].

Mr. RAY. The gentleman will pardon me just a minute there I do not desire to be understood that way.

Mr. ENLOE. Well.

Mr. RAY. In those days, and at that time, my observation led me to the conclusion that Union men sought the society of Union men, and disloyal men (and I do not speak offensively) sought the society and company of disloyal men; and it struck me as a little funny that a Union man in Tennessee should, if he was loyal all through the war, rush away to Texas immediately after the close of the war, where you could not find a Union man any more than you could find a needle in a haystack.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to proceed, I think he has not bettered his case by his explanation. The gentleman then puts it upon the ground of association, and he thinks loyal men would not willingly associate with ex-Confederates and their friends.

Mr. RAY. I did not say that.

Mr. ENLOE. But that is the logical conclusion of your argument. Now, I am taking your argument not as you perhaps intended it, because it seems the gentleman does not understand logic. [Laughter.]

But, according to your logic, loyal men should not associate with a man who was disloyal to the United States Government during the war, drawing his conclusions, I suppose, from his inner consciousness. I have no doubt the gentleman gets the most of his information and opinions by consulting himself and thinks he is correct.

Mr. RAY. I should certainly get a great deal more information by consulting myself than by consulting the gentleman from Tennessee; and, therefore, I shall get the information that way in preference to seeking it from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. That is only another evidence of the fact that the gentleman pursues that policy; because if he really understood the facts he would know that the "gentleman from Tennessee" could give him a great deal of valuable information.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman when he has made an argument the logic of which is that gentlemen on that side of the House should not associate with gentlemen on this side, and that is the logic of the gentleman's argument, he ought to follow it out and say that no man living in a Northern State should settle in a Southern State.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. ENLOE. Wait until I get through, and then I will let you have a chance.

Mr. RAY. All right.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to give you a little more time, because you will want to interrupt me in a couple of minutes, and I want to save you that trouble.

Mr. RAY. I gave you two-thirds of the time when I occupied the floor.

Mr. ENLOE. All right, then; but you will have to interrupt me again in two or three minutes.

Mr. RAY. I did not say anything about the loyalty of your side of the House. I do not believe that your side is disloyal.

Mr. ENLOE. I thank you for that statement.

Mr. RAY. You had no right to conclude that they are disloyal.

Mr. ENLOE. I did not.

Mr. RAY. You have no right to judge other gentlemen on your side. "Judge not, that ye be not judged."

Mr. ENLOE. I am glad that the gentleman has read a little of the Scriptures. That is the first evidence we have had that he has read the Bible. I want to say to the gentleman that he should "condemn not, lest he be condemned." And if the gentleman means to say what he does say, the meaning of his argument is that if a man living in a Northern State, a Union soldier perhaps, shall happen to fall in love with a lady living in the South, whose sympathies were all on the other side, and they were to get married, in order for the ex-soldier to come up to the gentleman's loyal standard, he ought to get a divorce, on the ground that he can not stand the association with anybody who sympathized with the South during the war.

I am afraid the gentleman is an enemy to emigration from the State of New York to the Southern States. I think he is afraid that some enterprising Yankee, living in New York, might see an opportunity to invest his capital in the South and make money, and he wants to stop it; and he does not know of any better way than to tell him he will loose his standing as a loyal citizen if he goes to a Southern community to live.

Mr. CARUTH. Will the gentleman give way to a suggestion?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly.

Mr. CARUTH. Did you ever see a decent man come down from the North who did not forthwith become a Democrat? [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. Well, I do not know but what on the whole that is true. I never saw a sensible man, in my judgment, who came there to live as a good citizen who did not soon associate himself with the Democratic party; but I would not expect anything of that kind from the gentleman from New York if he should come among us.

Mr. CARUTH. "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone." [Laughter].

Mr. PAYNE. Do you think he would make a mistake in coming down there?

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir; I do not. I do not think there is any spot on this globe to which an enterprising citizen of the State of New York, who has the characteristics of the average American citizen, would not immediately emigrate if he saw that he could do so with profit to himself. The South offers great opportunities for honest and enterprising citizens who seek to make homes for themselves and families, but we have no use for office seeking carpetbaggers who scruple at nothing. The motive that induces people to move is the hope of bettering their condition. I have no doubt this gentleman left Tennessee and went to Texas because he thought Texas would afford him a better field, a better opportunity to advance himself in life.

Mr. CARUTH. Do not some people "leave their country for their country's good?"

Mr. ENLOE. Sometimes a man has to leave his part of the country, because if he does not they would put him in jail. But we do not want people to leave other States and come to ours for any such reason as that. There are many citizens living in all the Southern States who were in the Union Army, men who served through that struggle, who have come into the Southern States and settled, and who are making good citizens. Most of them are good Democrats.

But I want to quote another authority. I want to quote a man who was perhaps not quite as great in his day as the gentleman from New York, but who had some reputation as a loyal citizen during the war. He was a man who had convictions on this subject, and he expressed his convictions on the floor of Congress; and for the sake of giving the gentleman from New York some information which will perhaps be of benefit to him in the future, I want to quote an extract from a speech of that gentleman. I refer to the late Senator Morton of Indiana. The speech to which I refer will be found in volume 71, page 303, of the Congressional Globe. It was delivered in the third session of the Fortieth Congress on the 12th of January, 1869, in the case of Miss Sue Murphy. Senator Morton said:

Let me take the case of a Union man in the South who has borne the heat and burden of the civil war, who has been persecuted, and who has sustained all those hardships that we know were incident to the condition of a Union man in the South during the war. To say that we will treat him as a public enemy and that we will refuse to pay him for his property deliberately taken by the Government—where under the same circumstances we would pay a man living in the North for his property taken by the Government, is revolting to the plainest principles of justice. I cannot subscribe to any such doctrine.

As the gentleman from New York would—

But then, I suppose the gentleman from New York is not acquainted with the principles of justice. Does this House intend to do this act revolting to the plainest principles of justice? Does it propose to refuse payment of claims established by undoubted testimony and at great expense incurred because of the action of Congress in referring the cases? Does this House propose to put the Government in the attitude of a dishonest debtor, who having clothed a tribunal with authority to arbitrate refuses to abide the decision though abundantly able to pay the award?

I here give you the views of the distinguished ex-governor of Indiana, then a Senator of the United States—a man who was a great leader of the Republican party—a prominent candidate before his death for the Presidential nomination at the hands of that party. I take this authority, and I set it up against that of the gentleman from New York. I quote from a man who knew the law, who had sound ideas of justice and right, who had respect for the courts of the country, and regard for the rights of individuals.

When you have established a court of this kind and have said that claimants against the Government must go to that tribunal to test the justice of their claims—must submit their cases to investigation; when the Government is represented by its counsel, when its agent goes to the territory where the claims originated and inquire into the evidence to be found among the people there as to the loyalty or disloyalty of the claimant, when this expense has been incurred by claimants, do you mean to say that you will go back of this court and will not submit to the decision of your own tribunal. I say it would be absolutely dishonest, after the justice of the claim has been established by a proceeding of this kind, for Congress to refuse to pay the claimant.

More than that, I will cite other authorities for the benefit of the gentleman from New York. I think he was in this House in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. RAY. No, sir; I was in the Forty-eighth Congress first.

Mr. ENLOE. Then you have not been here as long as I thought. If you had been here longer, perhaps you would know more of these matters. I say if the gentleman had been here in the Fifty-first Congress, if he had served here at that time under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Maine, who was then known throughout the country as the "dictator" and the "czar" of legislation, he would have known that that gentleman permitted to pass through this House a bill carrying over $500,000 of these claims.

There were more than 285 separate and distinct claims in that bill; and the gentleman from Maine permitted it to pass this House because he said he was satisfied of the justice of those claims and that they ought to be paid. I fought to carry that bill through the Committee on War Claims. I carried it by a majority in a Republican committee, over the opposition of the chairman, Mr. Thomas, of Wisconsin, who at that time played the role that the gentleman from New York is playing to-day. He thought that by attacking these claims and misrepresenting these people to his constituents, he would be enabled to retain his seat in Congress; but when he went back to his constituents, his distinguished services in attempting to repudiate the judgment of the Court of Claims, and to impeach the character of loyal citizens of the South, met with no response; and he sustained an overwhelming defeat at the polls.

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania. In the matter of the omnibus Southern claims bill which my friend says he succeeded in getting passed through the Fifty-first Congress, is it not a fact, known to the gentleman from Tennessee, that he succeeded in passing said bill by reason of his action in preventing for months the passage of any pension bills, and that he was permitted to pass that measure only because it seemed to be the only way that pension legislation could be accomplished?

Mr. ENLOE. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has asked me whether the passage of that bill was not due to the fact that I obstructed legislation in that Congress, I will say that the gentleman pays me such a compliment as I have not received before. It is certainly a great compliment to me, and a great reflection upon the Fifty-first Congress, to assume that one man should be able to come into this House of Representatives, composed of 332 members, and bulldoze through the House a bill carrying a half million dollars, and that the great body of that House, under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Maine, should have permitted one weak, thin Democrat like myself [laughter] from the State of Tennessee to come here and bulldoze through a bill of that character.

I say, Mr. Chairman, I think it is an unjust reflection on that Congress. I said the bill was passed because Congress was convinced of the justice of the claims, and that, too, after an investigation; and having done so, that it set an example of honesty to this country that I hope will be followed in the future.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to contend that when the House of Representatives refuses to make appropriations in these cases which have been before the Court of Claims that it is a reflection on the judgment of the court. Now, do I understand the gentleman to contend that the Court of Claims has authority to render judgment in such cases?

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman from Texas is quibbling now.

Mr. KILGORE. Not at all; that is your own language. You insist, as I understand you, that the appropriation must be made, because otherwise it is a reflection on or a repudiation, if you choose to call it so, of the judgment of the court.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, the gentleman from Texas knows that it is the judgment of the court on a state of facts presented.

Mr. KILGORE. No; it is a finding of the court on the facts.

Mr. ENLOE. And that is the only thing that goes to the court. It is a judgment on the facts presented; and it is just as much a judgment on the facts as is the judgment of the court on the facts in any other case that comes before it, where its judgments are final.

Mr. KILGORE. But it is not a conclusive judgment on this House.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman from Texas knows, just as every other member of the House knows, that it is not.

Mr. KILGORE. But I understand you to treat it as though it were a final and conclusive judgment.

Mr. ENLOE. It is a judgment on the facts, and a finding as to the justice of the claim and the loyalty of the claimant. Why, the gentleman knows that if it were a judgment, a final settlement of the matter, that it would not be here for an appropriation; it would be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury as other judgments of the court are paid.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not so understand. Because in the cases to which the gentleman now refers they are judgments both as to the law and the facts, and judgments from which an appeal can be taken. But that is not the case in regard to the findings of the court sent back to Congress.

Mr. ENLOE. We all understand that.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I want the gentleman to understand it. From your statement a few moments ago it would seem that you did not understand it.

Mr. ENLOE. Notwithstanding the gentleman's criticism the fact remains that Congress created this tribunal; that it has appointed the judges; that they are daily passing on claims from different parts of the country involving many millions of dollars, and Congress accepts the findings of the court on every other subject except this. Now, let me ask why is this exception made?

It makes the exception for no other reason than because of the fact that gentlemen come here and make a football of these findings of fact for political purposes, and play the part of the demagogue before their constituents and the country, to make votes for themselves to secure their reëlection. That is the reason. They have never, in a single instance, investigated the claims, so far as I know, and found that the court had made an erroneous ruling in passing upon the claims, or that its judgment was not worthy of credence because it had not considered the evidence.

When the omnibus bill was passed sometime ago, some gentleman, who offered to be overscrupulous, prepared and secured the adoption of an amendment providing that the Attorney-General should reëxamine all of the cases before payments, if in his judgment it was proper to do so.

Under that authority the Attorney-General went into the court and made a motion for a rehearing on a number of these claims; and after overhauling the Confederate archives and reinvestigating the claims and ransacking every character of evidence which could be obtained for or against them, and searching in every quarter where they could find evidence, I do not know of a single, solitary instance where the original findings of the court were discovered to be erroneous. Not a single case.

If the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] goes to the integrity of the Court of Claims, if it impeaches the honesty of that tribunal or its members, then it should be the duty of the member to rise in his place here in the face of such evidence of dishonesty and move a resolution that would bring about an investigation, and through that medium secure their impeachment and removal from office.

But the gentleman is perfectly willing that the court shall stand; that its judgments shall be final and conclusive in all other cases, involving many millions of dollars against the Government, but that it shall be regarded as not binding in cases of this character; and only in these cases, where the question at issue is the right of some loyal man in the South to receive payment for his property, does he doubt the integrity, the honesty, or the efficiency of the court.

I understand from his argument to-day and from his answer to the questions I propounded to him that he would be unwilling to authorize this tribunal to render a final judgment in claims of this character.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman will allow me a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. Have you on any occasion, when the question has been up before Congress of appropriating money to pay men whose claims had been adjudicated by this court, examined for yourself the findings of the court, or voted against such claims because you had not investigated them?

Mr. ENLOE. I have no recollection of having so voted.

Mr. RAY. Of course you would not vote to pay in any case unless you were satisfied that the judgment was correct?

Mr. ENLOE. My action would depend on what I knew of the case. If I knew no more of any case than the gentleman from New York does about this case, then I do not think I would vote against it. I would not condemn a man on mere suspicion, or deny a claimant any right on a mere suspicion.

Mr. RAY. Will you answer my question?

Mr. ENLOE. I have answered it.

Mr. RAY. Do you regard the decision, or the finding, I had better say, of the Court of Claims so sacred and so perfect, and and so conclusive in all of these matters submitted to it, that you would vote to appropriate the money to pay the amount in each case without question; or would you reserve to yourself the right, on examination of the case and evidence, to exercise your own judgment?

Mr. ENLOE. I regard the findings of the Court of Claims as furnishing to this House such prima facie evidence of the justice of the claim that I would not vote against its payment unless there was evidence furnished me to show that the court had erred.

Mr. RAY. Would you vote to pay the money in each and every case, and would you feel bound to do it in equity, law, and good conscience, unless you could find some good, satisfactory reason in the facts of the case which led you to think it was just and proper?

Mr. ENLOE. I would say unless I could find some evidence, I would not undertake to find reasons against it, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] does. I would not draw upon my imagination for reasons. I would not manufacture reasons, I would accept nothing as sufficient to impeach the justice of these findings except evidence to the contrary.

Mr. RAY. If you were not satisfied that a claim was just and proper to be paid, you would not vote to pay it, would you?

Mr. ENLOE. I would be satisfied whenever the court presented its findings here after an investigation. That would be evidence to my mind that the claim was just, and that it ought to be paid, and it ought to be such evidence that no honest man would attempt to overturn it except by evidence to the contrary.

Mr. RAY. You say you would be satisfied under certain conditions. You would not vote to pay a claim unless you were satisfied, would you?

Mr. ENLOE. I would vote to vest that court with jurisdiction to render a final judgment in every one of these claims, reserving the right of the Government to appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. RAY. You still dodge my question.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not dodge it.

Mr. RAY. My question is this: Would you vote to pay a single one of these judgments, as you call them, of the Court of Claims, before you were satisfied that it was just and ought to be paid?

Mr. ENLOE. Why, the gentleman must have a very peculiar comprehension.

Mr. RAY. Now, do not dodge the question. Answer my question.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not know whether I can answer it to the intelligence of the gentleman. It is perhaps my fault that I am not able to use language that is pointed enough.

Mr. RAY. Well, then, please come down out of the skies and deal with a plain, common man who only has ordinary intelligence and ordinary language by which to express his ideas, and answer me in plain, common English, honestly, not dodgingly, or by any subterfuge, whether or not you would vote to pay a judgment of the Court of Claims before you were satisfied that it was a just claim and ought to be paid? Can you understand that?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes; and I have told you several times that I would not. Can you understand that?

Mr. RAY. That is the position I take exactly.

Mr. ENLOE. I am glad you have got your comprehension to a point where I can reach it. I say that I would not vote to pay anything that I believed to be unjust.

Mr. RAY. That is just the position that I occupy, and it is because I am not satisfied that this is proper and just to be paid that I oppose it, and in doing that I exercise the right of an American citizen and a member of this House, and I shall continue to exercise it, and all the little twistings in and twistings out of the gentleman from Tennessee seeking to be sarcastic, in which he utterly fails, will not drive me from that position.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not think there is any danger of the gentleman losing his position. He evidently took it without any regard to the facts, or any knowledge of the case, and I would not have him change it. I think it would be a disadvantage to the measure if a gentleman were to get up here and give such reasons for favoring it as he gives for opposing it. If I had no better reason to give why this claim should be paid than the gentleman has why it should not be paid, then I would not open my mouth, for I would be sure that I would accomplish its defeat instead of its passage.

I do not want to waste any more time on the gentleman. I say that the Congress of the United States ought to consider the findings of fact in these cases by the Court of Claims as constituting a prima facie case that justifies it in making an appropriation, unless some one comes here and furnishes evidence in a peculiar case that the court erred in making its findings of fact.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Court of Claims does not determine any question of law at all; that it does not determine any question of the liability of the Government, and if it does not leave that question for the House to determine, whether the Government is liable or not?

Mr. ENLOE. Oh, yes; that is only a question of common honesty, and that is left to Congress.

Mr. KILGORE. That is a question of law, which the House must settle.

Mr. ENLOE. That is a plain principle of common honesty, and the Congress of the United States I suppose is capable of passing on a question of that sort.

Mr. KILGORE. I agree to that.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, I want to know how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ENLOE. I yield that time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to answer the question propounded just now by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] by asking another, and that is, if his idea of the object and purpose to be served in sending a case to the Court of Claims is correct, what is the sense of ever sending a case there?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I suppose you want me to answer?

Mr. BOATNER. In one moment. I do not want you to take up my time. The rules of the House and the law which sent these cases to the Court of Claims sent them there for a certain specific purpose. First, to have the Court of Claims report to this House whether this claimant was a loyal citizen; second, whether his property was taken for military purposes, for the use of the Army; third, the value of the property at that time; and right there the judgment of the Court of Claims stops. The Court of Claims, in order to reach a conclusion upon these points, must hear testimony on all the points involved.

The witnesses must be sworn. They are examined by the party in whose behalf they are put upon the stand. They are cross-examined by lawyers representing the Government. Every means by which their veracity can be tested and every safeguard and every opportunity to determine the real facts of the case is afforded. The court makes its report to Congress. It says in this particular case, pursuant to resolution of Congress, we find that Mr. A B was a loyal citizen of the United States at such a time and had never given any aid or comfort to those engaged in the rebellion; that such and such an officer of the United States took such and such property at such and such a time, and we find the value of that property is so much.

We find the facts alleged true. Such a man making such proof is entitled as a matter of absolute constitutional right to be paid for his property. This Government has no authority either in war or in peace to confiscate the property of a loyal citizen. It has not the right to take the private property of any man for public purposes except upon making adequate compensation for the same.

Then when the facts upon which such a claim is based are found to be true, and the man comes here to ask payment of the judgment, he is merely demanding his rights as an American citizen. But the gentleman from Texas says, "I have no confidence in these judges; none at all. I do not believe the facts they have reported are true and I am unwilling to pay the amount they find is due."

Mr. KILGORE. Do not do me that injustice.

Mr. BOATNER. I will not apply that to the gentleman from Texas particularly, but to all gentlemen who occupy his position on that subject who have no confidence in the judges, no confidence in the lawyers who represented the Government, and no confidence in the witnesses by whom the claims are proved. They do not know the witnesses; they do not know the lawyers; they know nothing to the discredit of the court; they know nothing about the facts; but they set their suspicion against the solemn findings of five judicial officers of the United States, based upon sworn testimony of witnesses taken before them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say, with all due respect to gentlemen who occupy that position, and with all due respect to their right to exercise their judgment upon any public questionf that in my opinion when they take that position, they assume the position of a juror who by reason of prejudice or refusal to conform to the law and the evidence willfully renders a verdict contrary to both the law and the facts.

Now take the argument adduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]; which shows the utter hollowness, the flimsiness, the worthlessness, the fallaciousness of the position they are driven to take in order to maintain their attitude. He gives the case of a citizen of Tennessee who adduced evidence, furnished by impartial officers of the Federal Government, who were in the Federal Army during the war, showing that he was a loyal and a Union man.

Now, the gentleman discovers by examining the papers that the man was disloyal and bases the opinion, which in his mind amounts to a conviction, upon these two deductions: One was, that this man moved to Texas after the war was over; the other was, that he found in the papers that this man had actually taken the oath of allegiance to the United States!

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman let me correct him?

Mr. BOATNER. Now, from those two circumstances the gentleman became fortified, impregnably intrenched in the position that this man was a rebel and that the committee was wrong in ever reporting favorably upon his claim. The testimony of the officers of the Federal Army, the testimony of other witnesses, the testimony of the man himself, the concurrent testimony of his neighbors—all these are to be ignored, forsooth, because the man went to Texas after the war was over, and because, pursuant to military order, he took the oath of allegiance to the United States Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the most conspicuous illustration I can give of the utter fallacy of the position occupied by gentlemen who oppose the payment of this claim.

Mr. RAY. I said that he took the amnesty oath.

Mr. SNODGRASS. And every other man in Tennessee did.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman had reached the conclusion of absolute conviction, a conclusion which he declares is immovable, that under no circumstances could he vote to pay these claims—in ignorance of the fact which is of public record and which, if he had looked into the case with an impartial mind, anxious to reach a correct result, he would speedily have discovered that when the war was over the military commanders and the military governors required that all good citizens, including the soldiers who had come back from the Confederate army, should take the amnesty oath, the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States.

Mr. RAY. There is a great difference between the two oaths.

Mr. BOATNER. And see the inconsistency of the gentleman's position. If this man had refused to take that oath he would have said: "Here is conclusive evidence that this man was disloyal." He would have said: "Notwithstanding the fact that this man is certified by all the officers of the Federal Army to have been a loyal citizen, yet when the test comes and he is asked to take the oath of allegiance to the United States Government, he says, 'I can not do it;' and therefore he is disloyal."

Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that unless the findings of the Court of Claims are to be treated with ordinary respect—unless they are to carry the prima facie presumption that they are justly and properly rendered—then it is idle to send any more cases to the court. If the gentleman from Texas and other gentlemen on this floor are going to say: "We will not recognize the findings of that court—not that we know anything about the matter ourselves, but we have a suspicion that the court is unfair; we have a suspicion that the lawyers representing the Government have not done their duty; we have a suspicion that the witnesses have committed perjury; and, therefore, we will refuse to vote an appropriation, though we have no evidence to sustain our position except mere suspicion"—then it might as well be understood and settled now that the Congress of the United States proposes to repudiate the obligations of the Government to loyal citizens of the South whose property was taken during the war by the Army for military purposes.

One word more with respect to this question of loyalty. I know that the gentleman from Texas believes (for he has frequently told me so) that there were no loyal citizens in the South during the war. Yet the fact is well known to a great many of us that there were quite a number of such citizens. In the county where I was brought up the delegate elected to the convention to pass upon the question of secession was elected as a Union man. He refused to sign the ordinance of secession. He was arrested during the war and was kept for a long time in confinement. His two sons left the country and went into the Federal Army. In that parish there were enough men who left and went across the lines to form a military company. I know that those people were loyal.

Mr. KILGORE. Have they ever come before Congress with any claims?

Mr. BOATNER. No, sir; because the Federal Army did not go through that country. And if the Federal Army had gone through there and taken the property of such men, the gentleman from Texas would have been equally ready to say, "I will disregard the testimony of every man who swears on the subject, and I will set my opinion, my judgment, my suspicion against any amount of sworn evidence, and in this way I will excuse myself from performing what otherwise would be my duty under the Constitution and laws of the country—to vote an appropriation to pay those men for their property."

In the face of the fact that there were large numbers of men who went into the Federal Army from Missouri, Tennessee, Kentucky, and other border States, can the gentleman doubt that there were loyal people there? Is it possible that there were no men in Texas who were opposed to the war and continued to remain opposed to it?

Mr. KILGORE. Plenty of them.

Mr. BOATNER. Is it possible there were no men in Texas who were loyal to the Union during the war and refused to give their aid and assistance to the Confederacy?

Mr. KILGORE. Plenty of them; but such gentlemen went into the Federal Army.

Mr. BOATNER. The Federal Army, if it had gone through Texas, would have been likely to take the property of some of these people; and if it had done so, and if the evidence were satisfactory as to the amount taken and the value of it, I would hold it to be my bounden duty to vote an appropriation to pay for such property, because I know of no principle under which the United States Government has a right to confiscate the property of its citizens in war or in peace.

It has no right to take the property of a private citizen and appropriate it to public uses without paying for it. Of course, that does not apply to property taken from those who are engaged in arms against the Government. But those who remain loyal to the Government have an absolute, unquestionable right to demand at the hands of Congress that they shall be compensated for property taken from them for the use of the Government.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] and I do not disagree as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, except where he misrepresents my position. Of course, when he undertakes to state my position, and goes far beyond what I ever contended for, he and I naturally disagree. But that disagreement is on his statement, and not upon the principle involved in the matter.

Now, the only thing about which we do disagree is the binding force and effect of the findings of the Court of Claims in such a case as this.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state just what effect he thinks it would have, and what weight such a finding or judgment is entitled to?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, now wait. The conclusiveness of the findings of the court in this case is the question at issue. The gentleman states exactly what the jurisdiction given to the court by the law is, and was intended to be; that is, that the court must first determine whether the claimant was a loyal citizen during the entire war.

That is a jurisdictional fact. That is a fact on which the court takes jurisdiction of the matter at all, and if the proof is not sufficient to establish the loyalty of the claimant, that is the end of the case. If the loyalty is established, the court goes on and inquires as to whether the property was taken by the Army or furnished to it by this loyal citizen; and if it was furnished or taken, then to ascertain the value of the property; and the court must necessarily hear proof of these facts.

Now, the gentleman says when the court makes a finding under such circumstances it is conclusive on the House, and that is the position I understand the gentleman from Tennessee also takes in regard to this matter, and there we separate; there our paths diverge and we take different roads.

Mr. SNODGRASS. The gentleman from Tennessee is not present just at this moment, but he only took the position that the finding of the court was prima facie, and that you ought not to override it without evidence sufficient to set aside the finding.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, just wait a moment now; do not interrupt me at this point.

They contend that it is a reflection on the Court of Claims for men to stand up and antagonize a claim when presented to the House, and that we are to rely upon the judgment of the court in such cases, and not upon the judgment of the House itself; that when we do not do so, when we refuse to accept their judgment, we are impeaching the integrity of the court and the lawyers who conducted the case in the court, for and against the judgment, as well as impeaching the testimony of the witnesses who swore in behalf of the case. And they make it their special duty to come forward to-day and undertake to defend the Court of Claims from these alleged impeachments, when in fact no such suggestions have been made.

I say the law itself—if there is any reflection on the court—casts it when it limits its authority to the mere passing on the question of fact, as I have suggested. The law does that. It limits their authority, not to determine the right of the party or the liability of the Government, but simply to state the findings of the court on the evidence presented and the determination of any questions—collateral questions—that may arise in the taking of the testimony. But they have no authority to render a judgment.

Now, if the Edmunds and Tucker act had been willing to give them the same authority that other courts have to try and determine a case on the law and the facts and render judgment from which an appeal or writ of error could have been prosecuted, why then the House might be concluded, perhaps, and compelled to act blindly and vote the appropriation in accordance with the judgment. For it is the universal practice, so far as I know, that when a court having authority to determine on these questions has done so, and rendered judgment on the law and the facts, and a final judgment against the Government—I think it has been the universal practice of the House, I repeat, so far as I know, to have Congress make an appropriation without much inquiry behind it—to meet the judgment. But that is by no means the case presented here.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he knows of any character of judgment that is rendered by the Court of Claims that Congress does not vote to appropriate the money to pay?

Mr. KILGORE. That depends.

They always have to make the appropriation after a court having such jurisdiction renders a final judgment; and Congress does not make any inquiry, as a rule, behind the judgment.

That has been my experience. But in these cases before the House the question presented is different. The House acts; it takes cognizance of the case itself, makes an investigation of it on the ground, I presume, that it does not regard this as a judgment of the court, but a simple finding of fact. The purpose of the law was to take that work out of the hands of the committees and bring it down within the rules of evidence by having it acted upon and considered by a court of law.

Mr. REED. That is to say, it is only an ascertainment of the facts, and it is afterward the duty of Congress to pass judgment on the finding so rendered.

Mr. KILGORE. That is it exactly.

Mr. REED. And that finishes the whole question, does it not?

It is simply a substitution of the Court of Claims for the report of the committee of the House as to the facts.

Mr. KILGORE. That I understand to be correct.

Mr. REED. If on the facts the members present do not believe that the claim should be paid, they are entirely at liberty to refuse the appropriation.

Mr. KILGORE. Undoubtedly. It is the business of the House to render its judgment on the finding of fact. That is, to determine the question of law that may be involved; and that authority is taken from the Court of Claims by the act which gives it jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. But a judgment of the Court of Claims stands upon a different footing from the finding of a committee, because it is a declaration by law of a debt due by the United States, while the other is only a preliminary statement of facts on which Congress is to determine whether the United States is indebted or not.

Mr. KILGORE. That is about as I suggested.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, will the gentleman from Texas answer this question?

Mr. KILGORE. I will if I can.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like also to have the attention of the gentleman from Maine.

The gentleman states this is only an ascertainment of facts in the case, and it leaves the question still to be determined whether the Government owes it or not.

Mr. KILGORE. Whether it is liable or not.

Mr. ENLOE. Whether the Government owes it.

Mr. KILGORE. Whether the Government is legally liable or not.

Mr. ENLOE. Whether the Government owes it; whether it is an obligation of the Government.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, that is the same thing.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, I will ask the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. KILGORE. I do not want to be taken from the floor by a three-cornered colloquy.

Mr. ENLOE. I will ask you, and the gentleman from Maine, as he has come into the fight, to answer this question: If the court finds that the citizen was loyal, and that the United States Army, acting under proper authority, took the property and converted it to the use of the Government, and the amount and value of that property is determined and correctly ascertained, then is it not an obligation upon the Government to pay it?

Mr. REED. Not until Congress has so determined.

Mr. ENLOE. I understand it is not a claim that you can go and enforce in the courts; but is it not as much an obligation upon the conscience of the Government, or as much an obligation upon the justice of the Government, as a claim for a pension is?

Mr. REED. When you get into the domain of conscience that becomes something for the individual member to determine upon.

Mr. PATTERSON. To determine how?

Mr. KILGORE. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not interfere further with my argument.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to propound a question to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. KILGORE. I am not yielding for the gentleman to address inquiries to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, I will address you, then.

Mr. KILGORE. I can not afford to be ignored in this matter.

Mr. PATTERSON. When the Court of Claims has reported the facts, is a member of Congress justified, on that finding, in voting against the claim, where he himself has made no investigation, where he knows nothing about the case himself, except what appears in the report of the Court of Claims——

Mr. KILGORE. That is generally a stump speech in favor of the claim.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will put the further question to you——

Mr. KILGORE. Do not ask so many at once.

Mr. PATTERSON. Do you know anything about this case? Have you ever investigated this case? Do you know anything about it except what appears here on the face of the report?

Mr. KILGORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] answered the first question propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee, whether a man was justified in voting against a claim after the Court of Claims had submitted its finding of facts, when he said that that was going into the domain of conscience and undertaking to affect the discretion of a member of this House, and that is a complete answer to the first branch of the inquiry.

The second branch of the gentleman's inquiry I will answer by saying that I am not talking about the facts. I do not know anything about the facts, but I say that a member of Congress is justified in pursuing his own course, in following his own judgment. He may be wrong——

Mr. PATTERSON. Will my friend allow me to make another suggestion?

Mr. KILGORE. Wait until I get through answering this. If the Congress of the United States, which enacted the Bowman act and Tucker act, had intended to bind this House conclusively by those findings, it would have authorized the Court of Claims to render a final judgment, which would have been binding and conclusive upon this House.

Mr. PATTERSON. Just one moment, my friend——

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir——

Mr. PATTERSON. You are a lawyer.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, a chunk of a lawyer.

Mr. PATTERSON. Suppose a court of chancery refers a case to a master to ascertain and report the facts; when that report comes in, if it is unexcepted to, the court invariably confirms it.

Mr. KILGORE. Renders a judgment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Now, I understand this Court of Claims to occupy about the same relation to Congress which a master in chancery occupies toward a court of equity.

Mr. RAY. Oh, no.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not want you to make a speech in my time.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is to say, the Court of Claims ascertains the facts and reports them. Now, you are in the attitude here of a court of justice. You are a member of this House, and you are passing upon this claim, not upon exceptions to the report, not upon a knowledge of facts contrary to the report, but you are arbitrarily, without investigation, ignorant of the facts, without information on the subject, deliberately repudiating the report of the Court of Claims. You are repudiating that very agency which Congress has appointed to ascertain the facts.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must protest against yielding to gentlemen to have them lecture me as to my attitude as a member of this House, and to tell me how ignorant I am.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, I am not doing that.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not mind being lectured, and I am ignorant, it is true——

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask my friend's pardon. There was no intention on my part to lecture him.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I said I was entirely ignorant of the facts.

Mr. PATTERSON. Did not the gentleman say to the House that he knew nothing of the case?

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; I did not say that.

Mr. PATTERSON. You say you have never investigated the case.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I must protest against this interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas declines to be interrupted.

Mr. KILGORE. I said I knew nothing about the facts in this case.

Mr. PATTERSON. Why, that is what I said.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, there is more involved in this than the mere question of facts.

Mr. ENLOE. What is it?

Mr. KILGORE. The question of the liability of this Government.

Mr. ENLOE. What sort of liability?

Mr. KILGORE. Legal liability. No claim ought to be presented for payment by the Government for which there is not a legal liability. The Court of Claims is not authorized to adjudicate that question. This House must determine that. This House must adjudicate whether or not the facts are as presented. Take the illustration suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, your colleague, that the Court of Claims was acting in the nature of a master in chancery; why, then, it was simply to ascertain the facts and report them to the court, and the court, if there was no objection, would render a decree on the master's report. But there seems to be some exception in this matter.

Mr. ENLOE. What sort?

Mr. KILGORE. I am not willing to say that the action of the committee or the Court of Claims is conclusive to me. If it was, there would be nothing to be done except to say, "Mr. Speaker, the Court of Claims has determined this question. It has found the value of the property this man has offered or given to the Government or furnished during the war. The Court of Claims has determined the question of his loyalty; and I ask that the appropriation be made." That would be all that would be necessary if we are to pursue the course indicated by the three gentlemen from Tennessee and the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman if he believes that when Congress passed the act known as the Bowman act it intended to invite a claimant to come into a court which it had constituted and established and then intending to repudiate the judgments of that court?

After the claimant has established his claim, after he has established his loyalty, and proved the taking of the property and proved its value, was it the intention of Congress to stop there?

Mr. KILGORE. Congress intended to do just what it said. It gave these claimants the right to go before the Court of Claims to have these three facts determined—the loyalty, the question whether the property was furnished or taken, and the value of the property.

That is exactly what Congress said they were authorized to do; and when they did that they must take their chance of having this House determine whether the Government was legally liable to that claimant, and whether it would make the appropriation. If there was no discretion there would be nothing to do but to enter the judgment as you gentlemen desire; but if there is any discretion, there is unlimited discretion. Everybody in the House knows that there is discretion in these matters. Everybody knows that except three or four gentlemen from Tennessee and one from Louisiana.

Mr. ENLOE. I will ask the gentleman this further question.

He talks about legal liability. I suppose, as the gentleman has pleaded guilty to the charge that he is a lawyer——

Mr. KILGORE. I am a friendly Indian now. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE (continuing). I suppose he knows something about the law. That being the case, I suppose the gentleman knows that in the Constitution of the United States it is provided that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation to the owner.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE (continuing). And when the fact is proven that the Government did take private property and did convert it to its use, does not that constitute a liability of the Government to pay for it?

Mr. KILGORE. That is the question.

Mr. ENLOE. Do you believe that constitutes a legal liability?

Mr. KILGORE. I say I have a right to exercise my own judgment.

Mr. ENLOE. That is not the question. I ask your opinion as a lawyer. You say by your action that that does not constitute a legal liability.

Mr. KILGORE. The case you cite would make a case of legal liability; but understand, I am not accepting your statement of a hypothetical case as absolutely applicable to this case. Now, I do not believe this House is bound hand and foot in this matter.

ADMISSION OF UTAH.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BYNUM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committees on Enrolled Bills of the Senate and House of Representatives be authorized to strike out the word "Fifty-third" where it occurs in sections 5 and 19 of the enrolled bill (H. R. 352) "to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," and insert in lieu thereof the word "Fifty-fourth."

The Committee of the Whole having resumed its session—

Mr. RAWLINS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of concurring in the resolution just received from the Senate, which has for its object the correction of a verbal error in the bill for the admission of Utah.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BYNUM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution just received from the Senate.

There was no objection.

The resolution was read.

Mr. RAWLINS. I move that the House concur in this resolution.

Mr. REED. What is the effect of the resolution?

Mr. RAWLINS. It simply proposes to change the word "fifty-third" where it occurs in two sections of the bill, to the word "fifty-fourth," so as to conform to the other provisions of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, the bill (H. R. 4590) to amend section 553 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

WILLIAM JOHNSON, ADMINISTRATOR.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 722) for the relief of William Johnson, administrator of Thomas I. Johnson, deceased, of Fayette County, Tenn., as found due by the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, to summarize the situation, I do not very much disagree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] as to the facts which went before the court. We do disagree as to the conclusiveness of the action of the court upon these claims. I dissent from the idea that those of us who choose to oppose these claims reflect upon the Court of Claims when we do so.

The Court of Claims, I apprehend, when a certain amount of proof is presented to it establishing the loyalty of a claimant, is bound to make a finding to the effect that the claimant is loyal; and when a certain amount of proof is presented to the court upon the question whether or not property was furnished or taken for the Army and a certain amount of proof is presented as to the value of that property, the court must make a finding on those facts.

No man can reflect upon the court for doing that. All courts do that. That is the ordinary procedure in a court of justice. And it is no reflection on the court to say that I have the right to discredit the facts upon which the court has made the findings submitted to this House. It is no reflection upon the court if I should say that from my knowledge of the situation in Texas the proof as to the loyalty of a particular citizen in that section of the country is not in my judgment sufficient, or that perjury has prevailed. It is no reflection upon the court for me to dissent from the action of the court in reaching its judgment upon any particular character of testimony. It is my right as a member of this House to determine the facts from my knowledge of the situation. I am not expected to accept the finding of the court as conclusive, or the report of a committee as conclusive. If that were so, this House would not be called upon to investigate any finding coming from that court upon a case submitted under the Bowman act or the Tucker act.

I say it is unreasonable to undertake to put those of us who oppose these claims in the attitude of reflecting on the Court of Claims. We regard that court and its action exactly as the law regards them. The law does not give the court authority to render a judgment. If Congress had intended that the action of the court should be final and binding upon this body, it would have said that the court should have the right to render final judgment. But it did not say that; and in the absence of such a declaration in the statute, we must conclude that Congress did not intend to give the court authority to determine finally and conclusively the liability of the Government in these cases.

But even if the judgments were final, and although it may have been the custom of Congress to pay a final judgment against the Government without much inquiry—if a final judgment were rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and were carried to the Supreme Court on a writ of error and confirmed by that court, any member of this House would still have the right to refuse to vote for an appropriation to pay that judgment, would still have authority to exercise his own judgment and discretion.

Such action of the courts can not be conclusive and binding upon any member of this House. It is unreasonable to say that because I have not had the opportunity to investigate the facts in this case I ought to exercise no discretion or judgment as to my duty in voting upon a bill which proposes to make payment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, this claim is from the district I represent, and I wish to state to the House very briefly what I think is the correct principle which ought to control a member of Congress in voting on such a question as this.

Congress has already established what is known as the Court of Claims, an instrumentality for the ascertainment of the facts in such cases. Now, Congress, through the agency of this court, employs counsel who go out through the various counties in which these claims arise, and take proofs in regard to them. The claimants have counsel also, and the cases are submitted to the Court of Claims; they are argued there, and the Court of Claims, on the case thus made up, enters its findings. These are embodied in the reports of the committees of this House, and they come before the House in that manner.

It is perfectly competent for any member of Congress to ascertain the facts to be otherwise than as reported if he can. He can go and take the record on which the court has acted, and come before Congress with it and show, if possible, that the Court of Claims was in error in its findings. But I do submit that no member of Congress has the right, in entire and utter ignorance of the facts, without investigation and without a denial of the facts established by the court, without any pretense of information in respect to the facts, to get up here on the floor of the House and arbitrarily condemn the findings of the court. Such arbitrary conduct on the part of a court would justify the impeachment of the judge.

Why, Mr. Chairman, in a court of equity, after a clerk and master has ascertained the facts and they are unexcepted to, they are undisputed, no controversy about them—of course the court could enter a decree refusing to confirm the decision of the master—but did any court ever do it?

Now, what is the pending case? Here is an instrumentality appointed by Congress to ascertain a state of facts. In the discharge of its functions it has found that, under a law of Congress, a certain amount is due to an individual for supplies or stores, and the facts are reported to this House, and they are undisputed, undenied.

Now, for Congress, the creator of that tribunal, the author of its very existence, to go back on its own instrumentality, and without rhyme or reason to say it will not make the appropriation to pay the claim which has been found, seems to me to be an act that is entirely unwarranted. Of course Congress can do it, but when it does it discredits itself and its own laws, and also discredits the tribunal which it has established for the ascertainment of the facts.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Do you understand that the question of the liability of the United States is remitted to the Court of Claims at all? Do you think the judgment of the court is final and binding, or do you think the court can do anything more than simply determine the three facts—the loyalty of the claimant, the owner of the property, and the fact of its taking?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is all.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do they determine the liability of the Government of the United States in the premises?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think not.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not that a question for Congress, and for each individual member?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think so.

But I will answer my friend, too, that it is the judgment of the court of equity on the report of its clerk and master which determines the rights of parties; but who ever heard of a court of equity arbitrarily repudiating the report without reason?

Mr. HEPBURN. The whole question of law is to be determined by each individual member for himself. You do not thereby attack the court. We may admit that every fact referred to in the report of the court has been correctly found, and yet each member of the House may believe that there is no liability existing on the part of the Government to make the payment.

Mr. WISE. And the court may so believe——

Mr. ENLOE. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be now concluded.

Mr. REED. I desire to say a word in this connection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine objects.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to add a single word to this discussion, and desire to congratulate the gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE and Mr. PATTERSON], as well as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], that at last they have come to the defense of the Court of Claims. I wish to remind them that there is a vast difference between the original jurisdiction of that court and its jurisdiction under the so-called Bowman and Tucker acts.

In that connection I wish also to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON], who spoke last, that the Court of Claims has no equity jurisdiction at all, either under its general jurisdiction or under the authority conferred by the Bowman and Tucker acts; and hence all his eloquent talk in regard to the "equities of the case" has nothing whatever to do with the findings of the court in this case or, in fact, with any other case that comes from that court before the House of Representatives.

It is known to all familiar with the practice before that court or familiar with its treatment of those cases when it is called upon simply to find certain facts, that those findings do not in the least determine the liability of the Government, but that they are returned to this House for its action as de novo so far as payment is concerned. But the gentlemen on the other side have not by any means been always so enthusiastic in behalf of the Court of Claims.

They have not been so enthusiastic in support of the judgments which have been rendered in dollars and cents under the general and original jurisdiction of the court. This very House has witnessed a partial repudiation of them, and a repudiation of over $400,000 worth of its judgments in the Indian depredation claims, and the $100,000 which was appropriated in payment of certain of those judgments of the court was wrung from the committee after nearly a half day's discussion.

Still more—and gentlemen on the other side should remember it, for they had control of the appropriations in the last Congress, so far as the House of Representatives at least is concerned, and of all appropriations in this Congress—there are now awaiting the action of this House, the judgments of the Court of Claims in the so-called "spoliation claims," amounting to nearly $2,000,000, for which they have not attempted to appropriate in this Congress, or in the last session of the last Congress, a single dollar.

Before gentlemen come here and demand as a matter of right that we should pass upon a bill where there has been simply a finding of facts, let them make themselves clear and clean in regard to the Court of Claims by making appropriations for its completed judgments, and we will meet them more than half way in a spirit of justice, and even in a spirit of equity, although equity jurisdiction is never conferred upon that court in any case where a judgment can be rendered, or in those claims which we have had under consideration this afternoon.

Mr. REED. I think there is just a single error into which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] has fallen, and I think if he will notice the bearing of one thing he has said upon his own remarks he will see the error himself, and its wide-reaching consequences. He says that if upon the finding by a master of certain facts the court should refuse a decree, it would be subject to impeachment. That is so. Now, why is it so? It is because, a certain state of facts existing both in law and in equity, a judgment follows. That is because both law and equity, in the technical sense, are necessary conclusions from facts.

But suppose the gentleman's court of equity was something like the Congress of the United States, a court bound entirely by its own discretion; not even by its own example, but solely by its discretion at the moment of its action. The gentleman will see at once that all the conclusions that he draws from that example of a court are necessarily fallacious. Now, Congress has the power which exists in the individual of saying to what extent he will be bound. That power is complete, and he may exercise it in any way that he sees fit.

Suppose a man is bound by a contract that he is obliged by law to keep. Suppose the other man says, "Here is an accident which has happened, and I want you to do something outside of this contract." That is entirely at the option of the man who is called upon. He can refuse or he can do it, just as he pleases. That is the condition of Congress with regard to all these matters.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will my friend——

Mr. REED. Wherever Congress has squarely stated that the Court of Claims may pass upon a matter, and give a judgment, why that ends the whole business. But the Court of Claims was denied the right to give a judgment in this case, and was only called upon to give a statement of facts, and Congress then can exercise its own sweet will on the subject.

Suppose the loyalty of the man is proven. Suppose the taking of his goods is proven, and the nonpayment on the part of the Government is shown. Nevertheless, after a lapse of twenty-five years the Congress of the United States may say—I do not say that it should say—that the matter should have been ended long ago. It may say: "We have given these claimants an opportunity to appear before two sets of commissions. They have failed to do it. Therefore we will not grant the claim."

You see the matter is wholly for Congress to act on; and to attempt to coerce it on the ground that the judgment of the Court of Claims is final, is not a fair coercion. It is a fair thing to say that the Court of Claims has stated such facts; on those facts do you not believe that this result ought to follow? And that is the full extent of the power of the case stated by the Court of Claims.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to put the point just in this way. Congress created this Court of Claims for the purpose of ascertaining the facts. Now, when Congress through its own instrumentality has ascertained the facts, I say it is trifling with the people, it is trifling with these claims, it is trifling with justice, to arbitrarily repudiate the claim, without rhyme or reason.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee for addressing the committee as to that point, and on that I want to make an observation. Congress did not create the Court of Claims for the purpose of adjusting these claims. The Court of Claims was in existence long before the Bowman act and long before any other act that has been described. Congress, especially the House of Representatives, found that in discussing these questions it began to dispute about facts.

Therefore, it is said to the claimant by the Bowman act, we do not want to have any more discussion in regard to the facts, and if you choose to come before us, you must prove the facts of your case before the Court of Claims, and thereupon we will listen to you on that state of the facts. We do not say we will agree to pay your claim because the Court of Claims finds the facts. We simply agree to listen to you.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the gentleman from Maine will suspend, and the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BYNUM having assumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that Committee had had under consideration various bills and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry recommendations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By direction of the Speaker pro tempore the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] will perform the duties of the Chair at the evening session. The hour of 5'clock having arrived, the House will stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. BROOKSHIRE, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session pursuant to clause 3, Rule XXVI, for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

DRUZILLA J. RIGG.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4290) for the relief of Druzilla J. Rigg, of Macomb, Ill.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee was last in session the point of no quorum was made on this bill on the motion to lay it aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been considered, the report has been read, and the disposition of the bill was delayed on account of the point of no quorum being made.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers were ordered, and tellers will please take their places on the motion to lay aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. Can not further proceedings under that call be dispensed with by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. They can.

Mr. POST. Then I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further proceedings under that call.

The CHAIRMAN. That is on the appointment of tellers?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, we are supposed to have a quorum to-night, and the question before the committee was that this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the question, and the vote was being taken by tellers.

Mr. PICKLER. But we are supposed to have a quorum now.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers were ordered by the committee on that motion; but that can be dispensed with by unanimous consent. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. JONES. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and tellers will take their places.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there no way to get rid of that thing?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I rise to make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order in Committee of the Whole. The House is now in the Committee of the Whole, and the committee is dividing. Tellers will take their places. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. POST, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. JONES, will take their places as tellers.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, have we to commence this where we left off? Can not we take a vote?

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent; but that was objected to, and tellers will take their places.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PICKLER. Regular order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there no way to leave this blil of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POST] on the Calendar without prejudice and go on and consider some other bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That could be done by unanimous consent. Does the gentleman prefer that request?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar?

Mr. HOOKER of New York. I object.

Tellers took their places, and pending the count,

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana said: I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Bills of the following titles were, by unanimous consent, passed over, retaining their places on the Calendar:

A bill (H. R. 3156) for a pension to Cornelia de Peyster Black, widow of Henry M. Black, late colonel of the United States Army, deceased.

A bill (H. R. 811) for the relief of Harriet Woodbury.

A bill (H. R. 3693) for the relief of Louisa B. Hull.

A bill (H. R. 5112) for the relief of Mary E. Cole.

A bill (H. R. 5616) granting a pension to Mary E. Tuttle.

A bill (H. R. 4290) for the relief of Druzilla J. Rigg, of Macomb, Ill.

A bill (H. R. 4962) to restore to the pension roll Sarah Beck, widow.

A bill (H. R. 5260) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Carigan.

A bill (H. R. 3354) for the relief of Mrs. Mary B. Hulings.

PATRICK KELLEHER.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6405) to remove the charge of desertion standing against Patrick Kelleher, late private Company C, Thirty-eighth Illinois Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Patrick Kelleher, late a private of Company C, Thirty-eighth Illinois Infantry, by removing the charge of desertion standing against his name and granting him an honorable discharge from said service.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or emolument of any kind shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. This report comes from the Committee on Military Affairs. I am not conversant with the facts of the case; and unless there be a request that it be considered, I shall ask that it be passed over.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to have it considered.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Very well.

The report (by Mr. BOWERS of California) was read, as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6405) to remove the charge of desertion standing against Patrick Kelleher, have considered the same and report the same back with an amendment, as follows: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or emolument of any kind shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act," and that so amended the bill do pass.

The military record furnished the committee and made a part of this report shows that the soldier served faithfully for two and a half years, then reënlisted, and in 1864 received a furlough of thirty days and went to his home in Massachusetts, and remained there sick, under treatment, unable to return to his regiment until it was mustered out. The soldier was severely wounded, at the battle of Murfreesboro, in his right arm, shoulder, and leg; is now badly crippled, and unable to labor for his support.

Case of Patrick Kelleher, late private Company C, Thirty-eighth Illinois Infantry.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, War Department, April 4, 1894.

The records show that Patrick Kelleher, aged 28 years, was enrolled August 4, 1861, for three years, and mustered into service as a private in Company C, Thirty-eighth Illinois Infantry, September 7, 1861. He appears to have served faithfully until December 31, 1862, when he was captured at Murfreesboro, Tenn. He was confined at Richmond, Va., January 15, 1863; paroled at City Point, Va., January 20, 1863; reported at Camp Parole, Md., January 21, 1863, and was sent to Benton Barracks, Mo. He rejoined his company May 6, 1863; enlisted as a veteran volunteer February 29, 1864, and is reported as having deserted May 12, 1864, at Mattoon, Ill., while on veteran furlough.

In an application for removal of the charge of desertion the soldier testified September 20, 1886, that in December, 1862, at the battle of Murfreesboro, Tenn., he was severely wounded in the right arm, shoulder, and right leg; that about April, 1864, he obtained a furlough for thirty days, being unfit for duty, and went home; that he became much worse and was under the medical treatment of one Dr. Page; that he remained under Dr. Page's treatment until his regiment was mustered out of service, and that he never received a certificate of discharge.

In another affidavit of the same date the applicant made a similar statement, adding that he had no intention of deserting, but was prevented from rejoining his command by physical disabilities.

Under date September 20, 1886, William G. Anderson testified that he had known the soldier for six years; that he (affiant) had been through the war as a member of Light Battery B, Fourth United States Artillery, and knew from conversations with the applicant that his statements are true, although he did not meet him on the battlefield. (Battery B, Fourth United States Artillery, was not present at the battle of Murfreesboro, Tenn.)

John J. Chapman testified in this same affidavit (dated September 20, 1886) that he had known the applicant since 1880, and identified him as the soldier in question.

The application for relief was denied February 21, 1887, and renewing the application in 1893 the soldier testified that he served faithfully until about April 12, 1864, when he received a thirty-day's furlough and went home to Massachusetts, and that while there he was taken sick, was treated by Dr. Page, was not able to leave his bed when his furlough expired, and was sick for about a year, and could then get about only on crutches.

On November 15, 1893, the evidence on file in the Bureau of Pensions was examined and found to contain nothing additional to that already cited, except the testimony of Dr. Nomus Page, the family physician, who declared that he had treated the soldier in April and at other times in 1864 and in 1865 for chronic rheumatism and malarial poisoning, and in another affidavit that he had treated him in May, 1864, during the remainder of 1864, and also in 1865, for debility and malaria.

On November 18, 1893, the application for relief was again denied, the evidence submitted not being deemed sufficient to establish that the soldier was prevented from completing his term of enlistment by disability contracted in the service and line of duty.

The status of the case has not since been changed, either by the introduction of new testimony or by legislation.

Respectfully submitted,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I have naturally very little sympathy with men who deserted their colors during the late rebellion. But this is a case that has probably as much merit as any case that has been presented to this House at any time. I know this gentleman; I know persons who served with him. The service was for two years and some months—long enough to entitle the regiment to reënlist. His service was of the best. During it he was twice wounded. While this is not shown by our hospital records, the fact of his having been taken prisoner at Murfreesboro and treated in some of the Southern hospitals is the reason there is no evidence bearing on this point in our hospital records. My colleague [Mr. BOWERS] and myself carefully examined this man here in Washington not long ago. He bears the evidences of the wounds that the report states he received.

Mr. McNAGNY. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to ask, what is this man's standing in the neighborhood where he lives? Is it fair?

Mr. LOUD. It is first class. He is not a merchant, not a wealthy citizen of high social standing; but his character for honesty and integrity is of the best.

When he reënlisted he was entitled under the law to a thirty days' furlough, in pursuance of which he went to his home. He states that he was not well at the time he took his furlough, but that he was particularly urged to reënlist in order to make up the requisite number to form a company. He went to his home; and was attended almost constantly from that time until after the close of the war by a reputable physician of his town, whose evidence is a part of the case. These are all the facts. If there is merit in any case, this is a meritorious case, as the soldier rendered gallant service for over two years and a half.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Is it the object of this bill merely to remove the charge of desertion or to obtain for him a pension?

Mr. LOUD. I can not tell what the object is. I suppose, if the charge of desertion be removed, the man will come in for a pension the same as anybody else would. He ought to have a pension by reason of the wounds he received.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Why is it that he has not had this charge removed before?

Mr. LOUD. The reason is that he could not get it removed under the law. He was at one time on the pension roll.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Drawing a pension?

Mr. LOUD. He was drawing a pension for his wounds.

Mr. McNAGNY. Will the gentleman pardon a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. McNAGNY. Is it regarded otherwise than legitimate and proper for a man who is a soldier, or a citizen either, to desire to clear off his record?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know that I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. McNAGNY. The inquiry has been made as to why this party did not take some action before. Now, does not the gentleman regard it as right and proper and commendable for a soldier to desire to clear off any cloud or blot that may be upon his record?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. McNAGNY. That, I understand to be what this soldier is endeavoring to do.

Mr. LOUD. He has been for some years trying to do that to the best of his ability.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. Through the War Department.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. I find that Col. Ainsworth refused to remove this disability, he says, for the reason "that the evidence submitted was not deemed sufficient to establish the fact that the soldier was prevented from completing his term of enlistment from disability contracted in the service and in the line of duty." As I understand, he was on a furlough at home at this time.

Mr. LOUD. He was.

Mr. HEPBURN. And while there was taken sick, and by that illness was prevented from returning to his command before the war closed. Now, is it true or not that in the office, as stated by Col. Ainsworth, his disabilities could not be removed?

Mr. LOUD. That seems to be the case.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, let me ask if there is any law requiring that the disability which prevents a soldier from returning when absent with leave must be contracted in the line of duty? While on leave, unless that be considered in the line of duty, it would seem to be an absurdity.

That construction, I think, can not be true, for when a man is absent from his regiment with leave he has no duty to perform, and it is impossible, therefore, for him to comply with that provision of the law saying that the disability shall be "contracted in the line of duty," if as a matter of fact, as in this case, it was contracted while he was at home on leave of absence. I do not believe that there ought to be any such law, or that this officer refused to clear the soldier from the charge for such a reason as that. It is an absurdity on its face, it strikes me.

Here is a soldier who was permitted to return to his home after his reënlistment. He was entitled to thirty days' leave of absence under the law, and while enjoying that furlough he was taken sick from a disease which rendered him incapacitated for service and prevented him from returning to his regiment until it was mustered out.

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman will permit me, that is the real reason why the bill has come here for consideration. If the disability had been contracted in the service, Col. Ainsworth could have removed the cloud himself. But that is the law.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was trying to find out if there is such a law which permits such a ridiculous state of affairs as that.

Mr. BRETZ. That is the law now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8 insert: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or emoluments of any kind shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. JONES. I do not understand exactly from this report who it was that refused this pension.

The statement of the service of this soldier—and the record so far as it appears in the Department here in Washington—seems to have been signed by Col. F. C. Ainsworth. Now, from that statement or official record it seems to me that this is not a case that Congress ought to be called upon to remove the disability.

Mr. Chairman, the only testimony here, the testimony on which the gentleman who has just taken his seat founded and based his remarks, is entirely the testimony of the applicant himself.

Mr. HEPBURN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, there is the testimony of Dr. Page, and two affidavits to the effect that he treated him during his illness.

Mr. JONES. I will read the testimony of Dr. Page. I submit that the only testimony presented here is the testimony of the applicant himself on this point.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, read it.

Mr. JONES. He testifies as to the wounds received, and as to his being confined in a Confederate prison, and here is the testimony of the two men on whom he relies to substantiate that statement. Under date of September 20, 1886, William G. Anderson testified that "he had known the soldier for six years; that he had been through the war as a member of Light Battery B, Fourth United States Artillery, and he knows from conversation with the applicant that his statement was true, although he had not met him on the battlefield." And the command to which he belonged was not even engaged in that battle. He based his whole statement on a conversation which he afterwards had with the applicant himself.

Now, there is not a gentleman here who would not be obliged to base his conclusions on exactly such statements as this if he voted to pass this bill. It is evident from the statement presented in support of the bill that it is one which should not be permitted to pass this House. The Pension Bureau had this testimony before it.

Mr. AITKEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. AITKEN. Would not that be a proper question when asking for a pension? The question now is whether he was sick when he was on that furlough.

Mr. JONES. I propose to read a part of the testimony adduced here by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to show that this man is entitled to the pension he asks for.

Mr. AITKEN. This is not from the Invalid Pension Committee.

Mr. JONES. The Military Committee, then, or the committee from which it comes. One of the gentlemen who has addressed the committee upon this subject alluded especially to to the fact of the man's having been severely wounded in that engagement.

Mr. AITKEN. I know; but would that have any bearing?

Mr. JONES. I am simply saying in reply to what the gentleman from California said upon the subject, that however he may be persuaded from the conversation which he and his colleague [Mr. BOWERS of California] had with this man, that the man was wounded in the way he describes, there is nothing in the record to show it. I think the affidavit of the man who undertakes to support the claimant is not worthy of consideration at all, from the fact that he was not in the battle, and all the information he had on the subject he derived from convervation with the soldier.

Mr. AITKEN. Does it make any difference whether he was wounded or not so far as this bill is concerned?

Mr. JONES. I am coming to that proposition. But the gentleman who I understand is in charge of the bill, and who has addressed the committee on the subject, based his remarks chiefly upon the ground that the man had been severely wounded when there is no real testimony to bear out that statement.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will allow me right there, I simply recited the facts from the beginning to the close of the case. That was merely an incident. The fact does remain that this soldier served two years and some months, long enough to entitle the regiment to be a veteran regiment, and to be reenlisted as a veteran regiment, and that he then went to his home. He received an honorable discharge after more than two years' honorable service.

I am perfectly willing to waive the fact that he was in a Confederate prison or that he was wounded. I do not insist upon taking that into consideration at all. The fact yet remains beyond contradiction that he did serve honorably for two years and a half, and more, and received an honorable discharge. He then went to his home, and it is in evidence that he was attended by a physician during the balance of 1864 and the whole of the year 1865, and was thus prevented from returning again to his regiment. That is the main point.

Mr. JONES. I have permitted the gentleman to interrupt me, and to inject a long speech into my remarks; but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this statement is a material part of this record, and the gentleman may well say that he is willing to forego any statement upon that point; he merely proposes to leave out that part of the report that is not substantiated by proper testimony, and to base this claim entirely upon the fact that this man was sick and unable to return to his command.

Mr. LOUD. I did not leave it out, but I said I was perfectly willing to waive it.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the gentleman is willing to waive a statement that is only supported by the man's own testimony. The two men brought forward by him to substantiate his statement know nothing whatever about the matter, and say frankly that their testimony is entirely hearsay, and that they gather their statement from conversations with the man himself.

Mr. PICKLER. Why not take the statement of the soldier? Is not a soldier's testimony good?

Mr. JONES. A man who is a deserter, a man who stands with the charge of desertion against his record——

Mr. PICKLER. He never deserted.

Mr. JONES (continuing). Ought never to have the charge removed on his own testimony.

Mr. PICKLER. In other words, your proposition is that the word of a Union soldier is a lie to begin with.

Mr. JONES. My proposition is that if a man deserts from his command in time of war——

Mr. PICKLER. He did not desert.

Mr. JONES. He did desert, as the record shows.

Mr. PICKLER. No, he did not desert; he went home sick.

Mr. JONES. The very language I am employing is employed in the record.

Mr. PICKLER. Technically.

Mr. JONES. The word desertion is employed in the report, and I say that as long as he has the charge of desertion placed against his name upon the records of the War Department, and he comes here to ask that the charge be removed, he ought to bring some testimony to substantiate his bare and unsupported statement.

When you adopt a precedent of that sort, can not any man, any single one of the 200,000 who deserted from the Union Army during the war, come here, without any testimony to support his own testimony, and ask that the record be corrected and the charge of desertion standing against him be removed? I object to the testimony of this character of men, and I insist it should not be accepted here.

Why, sir, to-day, in this very Hall, when we were considering private claims that had been reported by the Court of Claims, where the facts were judicially ascertained, where witnesses were cross-examined by representatives of the United States Government, I heard a gentleman on the other side of this Chamber state, a gentleman I see before me now, that he would not accept any finding of that court unless he personally was satisfied from facts outside of the record that the claim was a just and an equitable one and ought to be paid; and yet we are told to-night, and are constantly told when private pension claims are the subject of legislation, that we ought not to ask for further testimony when the committee having jurisdiction of the claim has reported it favorably, even when we know that the examination was entirely ex parte, and the testimony untrustworthy and illegal.

Any testimony or no testimony is sufficient for the majority of those who attend these night sessions. If a just claim against the Government, which has been adjudicated by the Court of Claims, where witnesses on both sides were closely examined, and where the Government as well as the claimant was represented by able counsel, can not pass this House because that testimony is not sufficient for the purpose of satisfying gentlemen that the claim is a just one, then how can gentlemen consent to pass a claim of this sort, when they have not examined the testimony at all, and when the only information they have is such as is before us.

I submit that no gentleman who takes the position I have referred to as to the findings of the Court of Claims could possibly vote to pass a claim of this sort, which he had not paid the slightest attention to, and had not examined, and knew nothing about.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs that made this report, I desire to state the considerations which have governed me in investigating measures of this character.

Desertion is one of the most heinous crimes that can be charged against a soldier. The punishment in time of war, in all nations, during all times, has been death.

The Articles of War provide that—

All officers and soldiers who have received pay, or have been duly enlisted in the service of the United States, and shall be convicted of having deserted the same, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as, by a sentence of a court-martial, shall be inflicted.

And it was not until May 29, 1830, that Congress provided that—

No officer or soldier in the Army of the United States shall be subject to the punishment of death for desertion in time of peace.

Section 1996 of the Revised Statutes, however, provided that—

All persons who deserted the military or naval service of the United States and did not return thereto or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the issuance of the proclamation by the President, dated the 11th day of March, 1865, are deemed to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship as well as their right to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof.

During the war of 1861 to 1865, and in all previous wars, orders were issued directing that soldiers should be marked on the roll as deserters under certain circumstances; and, as my distinguished friend from Virginia has stated, some 200,000 soldiers find on the rolls of their companies a charge of desertion against them. Now, many of these men having risen to high positions, many of them seeking to join societies which require an honorable discharge, finding this record against them, naturally seek in the only way possible to have the charge removed, especially when they know or feel it is unjustly recorded against them; and therefore they come to this tribunal—and I desire to say that this tribunal does not wipe out the charge of desertion in a single case where desertion has really taken place.

The only purpose of this bill is to correct the record, so that it will state the truth according to the law as it exists and the facts in the case; and the law is laid down that desertion is "leaving one's command with the intention of returning;" and therefore it becomes the duty of the committees of Congress that have this question in charge to ascertain from the evidence whether the soldier who left his command left it with the intention of not returning, or whether he left, as in this case, under leave of absence and was prevented from returning through sickness or some other cause.

Now, some criticism is made about taking the evidence of the man himself. In all judicial tribunals the evidence of the defendant or the accused is now admitted and weighed with all other evidence to determine the guilt or innocence of the party.

Mr. JONES. Not in all cases.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. In nearly all. As civilization advances, I will say substantially in all.

Now, the question is brought up that the effect of our action in this case will be to give the soldier a right to a pension. That is a matter we have no right to consider. We have no more right to consider it than a jury would have a right to consider, when trying a man for his life, whether his acquittal or his conviction would entail more or less expense upon the county. What would we think of a jury bringing in a verdict of murder in the first degree when the evidence showed it to be manslaughter, and give as an excuse that it would cost the county less money to hang a man than to keep him in jail for several years.

Mr. BRETZ. That is a good point, General.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, when I was first appointed upon the Military Committee, seeing the great number of cases of this character, and appreciating that the general laws were not adequate to giving proper relief, I suggested that general laws be enacted to cover the cases then before us; and during the years I have served on that committee we have from time to time reported to the House and had lawsenacted, not for the purpose of relieving any deserter from the charge of desertion, but for the purpose of authorizing the War Department to investigate the cases and determine from the evidence whether the men were really deserters, as understood in military law, or whether the charge against them was unjust and ought to be removed. The dates of approval of these laws were August 7, 1882, July 5, 1884, May 17, 1886, August 14, 1888, and March 2, 1889.

These laws specially limited relief to those cases where the soldier "did not intend to desert."

These laws also placed restrictions upon granting pay, bounty, or allowance to applicants or their heirs, and all these laws prohibited the giving of—any pay or allowance for any period of time he was absent without leave and not in the performance of military duty.

The House will therefore see that these various enactments only provided for changing the charges against a soldier from the charge of "desertion" to the charge of "absence without leave;" and these laws specially provided that the penalties for "absence without leave" should continue to stand against the soldier. Relief under the latest act became barred March 2, 1892, and therefore cases now must be brought before Congress by special bill, and it is the duty of Congress to give them all the most careful investigation and endeavor to do absolute judicial justice.

Now, I applaud my friends who insist on an investigation of these cases, because it is essential that such investigation shall be had to prevent injustice to the real soldier.

It would be very unjust to allow the charge of desertion to stand against a good soldier who is not a deserter, and it would also be unjust to good soldiers to wipe out the charge of desertion where the stigma was just and deserved.

All unjust charges are wrong, and the charge which is frequently made by Republicans that Democrats have not been liberal in appropriating money for pensions for Federal soldiers is untrue, unjust, and absolutely without foundation. It is as unjust and as untrue as some of the records of desertion standing against soldiers, which we are called upon to remove. [Applause.]

Now, the record shows that since 1861 there have been ten Congresses in which the House was Republican—twenty years; and the statement which I will place with my remarks shows that during this period these ten Republican Congresses have appropriated $800,776,651 for pensions—an average of $40,038,832.55 per year.

Mr. AITKEN. Where do your figures commence?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I commence with the appropriation for 1861, an appropriation made by a Republican House of Representatives.

Mr. AITKEN. We were not paying any pensions in 1861.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, the bill was prepared by a Republican House of Representatives, and I suppose they paid what they thought was right. The gentleman is mistaken, however, we were paying pensions at that time.

Mr. AITKEN. But the Democrats were in charge before the war.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; the Democrats were in charge before the war, and I invite attention to the record of that glorious Democratic party in all the period that they controlled the Government before the war. I shall make some allusion to that record, and I thank my friend for calling my attention to it. I will give the full record, and gentlemen can examine to see whether I do not do full justice.

Now, there have been fifteen years in which the Democrats have controlled the lower House of Congress, the Forty-fourth, the Forty-fifth, the Forty-sixth, the Forty-eighth, the Forty-ninth, the Fiftieth, and the Fifty-second Congress, and, thank God, they control Congress at the present time.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. They will not do it any more.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman from Kansas hopes that such will be the case, but he will find himself very much mistaken. The temporary depression caused by Republican profligacy and class legislation will pass away under just laws which we will enact, and returning prosperity will, I trust, give increased power to the Democratic party in 1896.

In these fifteen years, with I believe one exception, the majority of these Democrats have been from the Southern States; and the majority from those Southern States have been Confederate soldiers. And these men who are assailed on the other side of the House as not friendly to the Federal soldier have in these fifteen years appropriated for pensions to soldiers $1,139,502,950—an average of $75,966,863.33. In other words, the Democrats, a majority of them being Southern men and a majority of these Southern men being ex-Confederates, have annually appropriated almost twice as much for pensions for the Federal soldiers as was appropriated by Republicans when they controlled Congress. I have carefully tabulated the following figures, to which I invite attention, and I am confident that gentlemen will see I am absolutely accurate.

PENSION APPROPRIATIONS BY REPUBLICANS.

It will be observed that the appropriations and expenditures for pensions in recent years have run up to very nearly half the total expenditures of the Government, including interest; and in utter refutation of campaign charges made by Republicans that the Democratic party has not been liberal in paying pensions to the soldiers of our country, I have only to point to the official figures contained in these tables. The Thirty-fifth Congress was the last Congress prior to the Forty-fourth which had a majority of Democrats in the House of Representatives. The Republicans had full control of the House of Representatives and the Government in the Forty-seventh and Fifty-first Congresses. The appropriations by Republicans during the twenty years in which the ten Congresses existed were as follows:

TABLE No. 1.—Appropriations for pensions by Republicans during the twenty years of the existence of ten Republican Congresses.

Congress.	Session.	Year.	Amount appropriated for pensions.
Thirty-sixth	First	1861	$349,000
Do	Second	1862	1,082,000
Thirty-seventh	do	1863	1,450,600
Do	Third	1864	7,685,300
Thirty-eighth	First	1865	3,200,000
Do	Second	1866	14,796,000
Thirty-ninth	First	1867	17,940,000
Do	Second	1868	33,280,000

Forty-first	Second	1871	30,000,000

Forty-second	Second	1873	30,480,000

Forty-third	First	1875	29,980,000
Do	Second	1876	30,000,000
Forty-seventh	First	1883	110,000,000

Fifty-first	First	1891	123,779,358

Total appropriations for twenty years for pensions.			800,776,651
Average annual appropriations for pensions.			$40,038,832.55

We therefore see that during a period when Republicans predominated and controlled the House of Representatives the average annual appropriations for pensions was $40,038,832.57.

LIBERAL PENSION APPROPRIATIONS BY DEMOCRATS.

The Democratic party had control of the House of Representatives during the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-second Congresses, and they also control the present Congress. I give below the appropriations for pensions during the fifteen years of Democratic Congresses. It is as follows:

TABLE No. 2.—Appropriations for pensions by Democrats during the fifteen years of the existence of Democratic Congresses.

Congress.	Session.	Year.	Amount appropriated for pensions.
Forty-fourth	First	1877	$29,533,500
Do	Second	1878	28,533,000
Forty-fifth	First	1879	29,371,574
Do	Second	1880	50,233,200
Forty-sixth	First	1881	41,644,000
Do	Second	1882	66,282,306
Forty-eighth	First	1885	20,810,000
Do	Second	1886	60,000,000
Forty-ninth	First	1887	82,075,200
Do	Second	1888	83,152,500
Fiftieth	First	1889	85,258,700
Do	Second	1890	89,758,700
Fifty-second	First	1893	146,737,350
Do	Second	1894	166,531,350
Fifty-third	do	1895	151,561,570
Total appropriations for pensions for fifteen years.			1,139,502,950
Average annual pension appropriations.			75,966,863.33

We therefore see that during a period when Democrats predominated and controlled the House of Representatives, the majority of said dominant party being almost always from the Southern States, and very largely composed of ex-Confederates, the average annual appropriations for pensions was $75,966,863.33. In other words, we see that Democrats and ex-Confederates have been nearly twice as liberal as Republicans in pension appropriation bills for soldiers. The Federal soldier has begun to realize that Southern men and ex-Confederates are really his best friends; he recognizes that the ex-Confederates always vote for proper pensions to real soldiers and honestly and intelligently seek to protect the real soldier in his pension by insisting that the pension roll shall not be encumbered and broken down by the addition of names of unworthy men who have no right to pensions.

Now, my friend from Michigan [Mr. AITKEN] said something about the period before the war.

Mr. AITKEN. I hope the gentleman will not feel compelled to go back to "the period before the war" on account of anything I said.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I know the gentleman does not like to have us go back to the period before the war and point to that glorious career of the Democratic party which, during seventy-two years of Democratic rule, changed this country from a wilderness to the happiest, most prosperous, and powerful Government on earth [applause on the Democratic side]; a Government under Democratic and equal laws, with bounties and burdens extending alike over the rich and the poor—a period during which we heard nothing of monopolies and trusts, things which have been created under the centralizing laws of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. AITKEN. The sugar trust included.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The sugar trust included—a creature of the Republican party, a monopoly which could never have come into existence but for the unjust centralizing class legislation of the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AITKEN. And still alive under a Democratic Administration.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Still alive, but which will cease to live if my vote and the votes of those who agree with me can prevail.

Mr. LACEY. Why not give us the history of the last year of those seventy-two years of Democratic rule, letting the other seventy-one go by?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will gladly give the gentleman all the information possible regarding the record of the Democratic party at that time.

Mr. AITKEN. If my friend will excuse me a moment, I hope he will explain to the gentleman from Virginia what consideration the Committee on Military Affairs gave to the testimony of this doctor in regard to this soldier being sick when he was home.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I rose for the purpose of expressing my views as to the general principles that should govern this question; and then I propose to apply them to this case.

I regret that explanations demanded of me by gentlemen on the Republican side of the House have forced me into discussions which have no real connection with the matter before the House, and which I would prefer to avoid at this time.

Now, as to 1860, the last year of Democratic rule before the war——

Mr. PICKLER. This is the last year of Democratic rule.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will not discuss that question now; I am anxious to hurry through my speech.

During the year ending June 30, 1861, the Democratic party spent for the support of this Government $66,650,213; and the year ending June 30, 1860, they spent $63,200,875.

DEMOCRATIC ECONOMY.

They spent during seventy-two and one-third years, from the beginning of the Government up to that time, $2,793,100,432, the average being $38,625,351 a year.

In his speech of June 5, 1894, in the Senate of the United States, Senator ALLEN of Nebraska very correctly informed the country that through vicious legislation during President Harrison's Administration the Treasury was rendered bankrupt on the 4th day of March, 1893.

The Senator was explaining why he was willing to vote for a tax on sugar.

His exact language was:

If the $100,000,000 that were found in the Treasury when Mr. Harrison came into the Presidential office had been judiciously used there would be no necessity to-day for the levying of a tax upon sugar.

Over $25,000,000 of that surplus was taken out of the Treasury and paid as a premium upon bonds, and through that and other means equally vicious the Treasury was rendered bankrupt on the 4th day of March, 1893. The country was bankrupt. The $100,000,000 had disappeared; the national debt increased; the expenses of the Government were pressing upon us.

Those intrusted with the duty of making laws have few greater responsibilities than the most careful scrutiny of every appropriation of money.

Every dollar in the Treasury must in some way come from the people. It is money earned by them, and under laws enacted by the Republican party the money which is collected as tax is very largely paid by the men and women who earn their daily bread. Could there be a higher duty than to guard this sacred fund?

As a guide for the future, let us give some investigation of the action of our Government in the past in this matter of appropriation and expenditures.

In order to more clearly present this matter to Congress I have prepared Tables No. 1 and No. 2, which I have already read, showing the appropriation for pensions by Republican and Democratic Congresses.

I have also prepared Table No. 3, showing the expenditures of the Government for the seventy-two years from 1789 to 1861, during substantially all of which time we were under Democratic administration.

This table comprises all expenditures of every character, including the cost of all wars—the war of 1812, all Indian wars, the war with Mexico, and the preparation for a war with Tripoli.

I have also prepared Table No. 4, showing the total expenditures during the years of war, from June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1865.

Also Table No. 5, showing total expenditures from June 30, 1865, to June 30, 1894.

Also Table No. 6, showing expenditures before the war, during the war, and since the war.

Also Table No. 7, showing the aggregate appropriations made by each session of Congress from 1866 to the present time. The appropriation for the present session only gives the various amounts as the bills passed the House.

It will be observed that appropriations always exceed expenditures. This should of necessity be so, because it often occurs that appropriations are only partly expended, and sometimes all is returned to the Treasury; and we are compelled to appropriate for the full expenditures of the Post-Office Department, notwithstanding that most of this vast sum, and sometimes all, is earned, and therefore balances off appropriation.

Table No. 8 gives a summary of expenditures of State, county, city and other local governments.

Table No. 9 shows Federal, State, and local receipts and expenditures, arranged in order of amount.

Table No. 10 shows receipts and expenditures of Post-Office Department.

Table No. 3 is as follows:

It is well to remember that with such a record of Democratic economy the Republican convention which nominated Abraham Lincoln for President denounced the expenditure which averaged $38,625,351, as reckless extravagance; and yet the same Republican party immediately launched out into an expenditure which during the first few years of Republican administration averaged annually $835,595,102.61, more than twenty-one times as great as the average expenditure by Democrats.

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM 1860.

The language of the Republican platform of 1860 was in these words:

That the people justly view with alarm the reckless extravagance which pervades every department of the Federal Government; that a return to rigid economy and accountability is indispensable to arrest the systematic plunder of the public Treasury by favored partisans.

I call attention to the fact that the year immediately preceding the meeting of this Republican convention the total expenditure of the Government under Democratic appropriations was $63,200,875; the convention denounced this as reckless extravagance, and yet during the first four years of their control of the Government they expended the enormous annual average of $825,595,102.61.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. What four years?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The four years of the war. I will be perfectly frank with you. I will go on and explain. I intend to do no injustice.

REPUBLICAN EXTRAVAGANCE.

They spent thirteen times as much as the Democratic party spent in 1860, and twenty-one times as much as the average annual expenditure of that party up to 1861, during a period in which the Democratic party carried on the Indian wars, the war of 1812, the Mexican war, and made all the preparations incident to the Tripoli war; they also purchased in that time as a part of the same expenditure what now constitutes the States of Louisiana and Florida, as well as the Gadsden purchase, all of which cost the people only thirty-eight millions a year, while the Republican party, that charged them in their platform with reckless extravagance, expended in each of the four years of war eight hundred and thirty-five millions.

I will now give the table showing the expenditures of the Government under Republican administration during the four years of war. During these four years the total expenditure of the Government was $3,352,380,410.46; the average each year was $835,595,102.61; the average population during that period was 33,611,964. Therefore the average annual expenditure per capita was $24.93.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I desire, with the gentleman's consent, to ask him a question. How was it that, in view of the splendid prosperity that existed for seventy-two years under Democratic administration, a party—a new party—coming into power at that time was compelled to expend, as the gentleman says, thirty-two times as much as the former Administrations expended; and I hope the gentleman will tell us why it was that these expenditures were required so much in excess of the former expenses of the Government?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will do so; but I do not wish to be drawn into questions of this character.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. For I am sure there is no man in this House, or in the United States perhaps, that can give a better or a more correct statement from personal knowledge of the reasons which required this great expenditure than my splendid cavalry friend who stands here now on my left. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to suggest to the gentleman, as he referred to the Indian wars, that my friend from Arkansas has a case of an Indian war survivor——

Mr. WHEEER of Alabama. Well, I hope we will pass it.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will allow us to consider these cases.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I did not intend or desire to enter into any discussion about the war, but in reply to the question of the distinguished gentleman from New York, Gen. CURTIS, I will say that these expenditures were caused by events which I deplored. The armies causing these immense expenditures were raised for reasons with which I was not in sympathy, and I regretted very much that they were raised. [Laughter and applause.] I never thought them necessary, because I believed then, as I believe now, that our appeals should have been heeded when we went on our knees at the peace congress in Philadelphia to beg for arbitration and peace, and to beg that some guaranty should be given that the Constitution of the country should be regarded.

CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE IN THE PEACE CONVENTION.

Chief Justice Chase told our Southern people in his great speech of February 6, 1861, that neither he nor any of the leaders of the Republican party could guarantee to the South that the party coming into power would obey the clause of the Constitution which pledged protection to the property of the people of the South.

Mr. Chase said:

The result of the national canvass which recently terminated in the election of Mr. Lincoln has been spoken of by some as the effect of a sudden impulse or of some irregular excitement of the popular mind; and it has been somewhat confidently asserted that, upon reflection and consideration, the hastily formed opinions which brought about the election will be changed.

* * * * * * *

I can not take this view of the result of the Presidential election. I believe, and the belief amounts to absolute conviction that the election must be regarded as a triumph of principles cherished in the hearts of the people of the free States.

* * * * * * *

We have elected him (Mr. Lincoln). After many years of earnest advocacy and of severe trial we have achieved the triumph of that principle. By a fair and unquestioned majority we have secured that triumph. Do you think we, who represent this majority, will throw it away? Do you think the people will sustain us if we undertake to throw it away? I must speak to you plainly, gentlemen of the South. It is not in my heart to deceive you. I therefore tell you explicitly that if we of the North and West would consent to throw away all that has been gained in the recent triumph of our principles the people would not sustain us, and so the consent would avail you nothing.

Mr. Chase in that speech, with great force, gave the South to understand that the Northern States would not and ought not to comply with the obligations of the Federal Constitution.

He said if the leaders attempted an enforcement of that part of the Constitution which the South demanded the people of the North could not sustain them, and they would be powerless.

But he said we may do this: We admit the contract, we admit the constitutional contract, and we may regard it similar to cases in chancery where circumstances have arisen that make a party unable to comply with his contract, and therefore the court decrees pecuniary compensation.

CAUSES OF THE WAR

There were many reasons which brought on the conditions which culminated in the war, which necessitated the vast expenditure of money which is exhibited in the table.

The doctrine of State rights, protective tariff, internal improvements, and in fact all the questions upon which the Democratic party differed with their political opponents, entered into the question; but as history seems to contend that the existence of slavery was the main cause, I will comply with my friends' request and from a Southern standpoint give some reasons which come to my mind, and in doing so I beg that every one present will believe me when I disclaim any feeling or any disposition to censure any one or any section.

I know all, and especially I know the soldiers, will accept my statements in the same good feeling in which they are uttered, and will appreciate the propriety of a Southern man calling attention to historical facts, which refute allegations made upon this floor, that the responsibility of the war rested altogether upon the Southern people.

When the people of the South settled on the shores of Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, they had no intention of encouraging or even tolerating the institution of slavery.

The thrifty New England seamen, in their voyages to the Indies and other countries, saw its practical operation, and solely with the view of profit in the transportation and sale of the African, they, with characteristic energy, urged upon all the colonies the great advantages which would result from utilizing this character of labor. Their friends in the North readily acceded to their importunities, but not so with those of the South.

SOUTHERN COLONIES OPPOSED SLAVERY.

Oglethorpe and his colonists were possibly the most determined in resisting the importation, sale, and use of African slaves; and for twenty years they were successful in the enforcement of the law which prohibited the landing of slaves in Georgia. Finally, together with the other Southern States, they succumbed, and the New England shipowners amassed fortunes by plying the business of buying negroes in Africa, transporting them to the United States, and selling them for the most part to Southern people.

The evil of this traffic soon became apparent to the people of the South, and when the Constitution was framed in 1787, the South demanded that the fundamental law of our land should inhibit this traffic of importing human beings from Africa. The South was resisted by the New England slave-traders, and as a compromise it was agreed that the trade should be restricted and after the year 1800 entirely prohibited, but by the persistency of New England the provision was finally extended to the year 1808.

It has been charged that the opposition of Southern slaveholders which was manifested in the convention to the continued importation of slaves was attributable to their desire to maintain the value of the slave property they already possessed, but contemporaneous writing clearly shows that the mass of these people were actuated by no such selfish motives.

Very soon the people of the North found that their climate was not adapted to slave labor, and as the Constitution prohibited the continuance of the profitable business of catching or buying negroes in Africa and selling them to the people of the South, they ceased to have any interest in this class of property. I do not say that the lack of pecuniary interest actuated any one, but about this time there commenced what history will record as a war upon the institution of slavery.

NORTHERN STATES NULLIFY THE CONSTITUTION.

Instead of upholding and enforcing the constitutional guarantee which I have read, many States of the North enacted laws making it a criminal offense for any official to comply with his oath of office and comply with the terms of the Constitution, so far as it affected this question. This was done against the protest of such great men as Edward Everett and Daniel Webster.

This precise question was discussed by that great statesman, Daniel Webster, in his Buffalo speech of May 22, 1851. He said:

Then there was the other matter, and that was the fugitive-slave law. Let me say a word about that. Under the provisions of the Constitution, during Washington's Administration, in the year 1793, there was passed by general consent a law for the restoration of fugitive slaves. Hardly anyone opposed it at that period; it was thought to be necessary in order to carry the Constitution into effect; the great men of New England and New York all concurred in it. It passed and answered all the purposes expected from it till about the year 1841 or 1842, when the States interfered to make enactments in opposition to it.

We see here that Mr. Webster states that these laws, enacted by Northern States nullifying this constitutional provision, commenced as far back as 1841 to 1842. He continued:

Now I undertake, as a lawyer and on my professional character, to say to you and to all, that the law of 1850 is decidedly more favorable to the fugitive than Gen. Washington's law of 1793. * * * Such is the present law, and, much opposed and maligned as it is, it is more favorable to the fugitive slave than the law enacted during Washington's Administration in 1793, which was sanctioned by the North as well as by the South. The present violent opposition has sprung up in modern times. From whom does this clamor come? * * * Look at the proceedings of the anti-slavery conventions in Ohio, Massachusetts, and at Syracuse, in the State of New York. What do they say? That, so help them God, no colored man shall be sent from the State of New York back to his master in Virginia. Do not they say that! And to the fulfillment of that they pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. Their sacred honor! They pledge their sacred honor to violate the Constitution; they pledge their sacred honor to commit treason against the laws of their country.

We see here that Daniel Webster charged that the agitators against slavery were guilty of pledging their honor to violate the Constitution. He said they pledged their sacred honor to commit treason against the laws of their country. If possible, Mr. Webster was even more emphatic in his great speech at Capon Springs. This devoted patriot said:

The leading sentiment in the toast from the chair is the Union of the States.

The Union of the States. What mind can comprehend the consequences of that Union, past, present, and to come? The Union of these States is the all-absorbing topic of the day; on it all men write, speak, think, and dilate from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof. And yet, gentlemen, I fear its importance has been insufficiently appreciated.

Again, speaking as a constitutional lawyer, Mr. Webster said:

How absurd it is to suppose that when different parties enter into a compact for certain purposes either can disregard any one provision, and expect, nevertheless, the other to observe the rest! I intend, for one, to regard and maintain and carry out to the fullest extent the Constitution of the United States, which I have sworn to support in all its parts and all its provisions. It is written in the Constitution—

"No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

That is as much a part of the Constitution as any other, and as equally binding and obligatory as any other on all men, public or private. And who denies this? None but the abolitionists of the North. And pray what is it they will not deny? They have but the one idea; and it would seem that these fanatics at the North and the secessionists at the South are putting their heads together to devise means to defeat the good designs of honest, patriotic men. They act to the same end and the same object, and the Constitution has to take the fire from both sides.

Mr. Webster then told his hearers that if the Northern States persisted in their refusal to comply with the Constitution the South would no longer be bound to observe the constitutional compact. He said:

I have not hesitated to say, and I repeat, that if the Northern States refuse willfully and deliberately to carry into effect that part of the Constitution which respects the restoration of fugitive slaves, and Congress provide no remedy, the South would no longer be bound to observe the compact. A bargain can not be broken on one side and still bind the other side. I say to you gentlemen in Virginia, as I said on the shores of Lake Erie and in the city of Boston, as I may say again in that city or elsewhere in the North, that you of the South have as much right to recover your fugitive slaves as the North has to any of its rights and privileges of navigation and commerce.

Mr. Webster also said:

I am as ready to fight and to fall for the constitutional rights of Virginia as I am for those of Massachusetts.

Then followed the election of Abraham Lincoln upon a platform which clearly informed the Southern people that the guaranties of the Constitution which they revered, and the doctrines of State rights and other principles of government which they cherished, were to be ignored and that they were to be deprived of the greater part of their property and all possibility of continued prosperity.

The South was of necessity alarmed. They were seized with the fear that the extreme leaders of the Republican party would not stop at any excess, that they would not be satisfied with depriving them of their property, but that so far as possible they would place the ignorant slave not only upon equality with but even above his former master.

It was but natural that such an impending fate horrified the people, and that measures to avert it were contemplated and discussed.

SOUTHERN PEOPLE DEVOTED TO THE UNION.

The Southern people loved the Union with a devotion which had no precedent in the history of the world. It was a work very largely of their creation. Their blood and treasures were freely given to secure its independence. The South gave to that sacred cause the voice and eloquence of Patrick Henry to arouse the people to action; the pen of Jefferson to write the Declaration that we were a free and independent people; the sword of Washington to win the battles which made us one of the nations of the earth; and it also furnished Chief Justice Marshall to proclaim the principles upon which American jurisprudence and civil liberty are founded.

They were Southern men with Washington who crossed the Alleghanies one hundred and forty-one years ago to defend the pioneers who were braving the dangers of the Western forest. They were Southern men who, under Capt. Morgan, hastened to the defense of Massachusetts at the first sound of battle at Concord and Lexington. In the war of 1812 the South gave her undivided support to the flag, and largely contributed to the success of our arms. The last battle of that war was fought by a Southern general, with Southern men on Southern soil.

In the Indian wars the South always furnished her full share of soldiers, and in the Mexican war the killed and wounded from the Southern States in proportion to population was about three times that of the States of the North. In the war of 1861–'65 the South furnished 640,000 to the Federal Army, a larger number than it furnished to the Conferate army. This was the only period during which there was any division of sentiment on this point among the Southern people, for since 1865 they have been as devoted to the flag and the Union as the people of any part of our land.

The people of the South did not wish to give up the benefits of a government to the establishment of which they had so largely contributed. They were loyal and law-abiding, and refused to follow the example of the participants in the Shay rebellion in New York, the whisky rebellion in Pennsylvania, the Dorr rebellion in Rhode Island, and the Hartford convention rebellion in Connecticut; but they reluctantly succumbed to the conviction that the party about to take control would have no respect for their rights. For more than half a century they had been taught by their Northern brethren that when the people of a State found that it was not to their advantage to remain in the Union it was not only their privilege but their duty to peacefully withdraw from it.

SECESSION ADVOCATED BY MASSACHUSETTS.

Ninety years ago the people of Massachusetts expressed themselves in favor of the principle of secession by the enactment of the following resolution in the Massachusetts Legislature:

That the annexation of Louisiana to the Union transcends the constitutional power of the Government of the United States. It formed a new confederacy to which the States united by the former compact are not bound to adhere.

It is clearly shown by the history of the times that the people of New England were very pronounced in their expressions that the Constitution recognized the unquestioned right of a State to secede from the Union.

At the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of Washington, April 30, 1839, ex-President John Quincy Adams delivered an address which was received with great approval by the people. In that speech Mr. Adams said:

But the indissoluble union between the several States of this confederated nation is, after all, not in the right, but in the heart. If the day should ever come (may Heaven avert it!) when the affections of the people of these States shall be alienated from each other; when the fraternal spirit shall give way to cold indifference, or collision of interest shall fester into hatred, the bands of political asseveration will not long hold together parties no longer attracted by the magnetism of conciliated interests and kindly sympathies; and far better will it be for the people of the disunited States to part in friendship from each other than to be held together by constraint. Then will be the time for reverting to the precedents which occurred at the formation and adoption of the Constitution to form again a more perfect Union by dissolving that which could no longer bind, and to leave the separated parts to be reunited by the law of political gravitation to the center.

It is very evident that Mr. Adams and the people of New England generally regarded these views as the correct interpretation of the original compact which bound the people together. I will call attention to the fact that three years later, January 24, 1842, he presented a petition to Congress from citizens of Haverhill, Mass. I read from Congressional Globe, volume 11, page 977:

Monday, January 24.—In the House, Mr. Adams presented the petition of sundry citizens of Haverhill, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that Congress will immediately adopt measures peaceably to dissolve the Union of these States.

First, because no union can be agreeable and permanent which does not present prospects of reciprocal benefit; second, because a vast proportion of the revenues of one section of the Union is annually drained to sustain the views and course of another section, without any adequate return; third, because, judging from the history of past nations, that Union, if persisted in in the present state of things, will certainly overwhelm the whole nation in destruction.

There was a strong manifestation against receiving the petition, and by some it was denounced as treason and perjury.

On page 980, Mr. Adams spoke in his own defense and in favor of the petition. He said:

I hold that it is no perjury, that it is no high treason, but the exercise of a sacred right to offer such a petition, and that it is as false in morals as it is inhuman to fasten that charge on men who, under the countenance of such declarations as I have here quoted, come and ask of this House a redress of grievances. And if they do mistake their remedy, this Government should not turn them away and charge them with high treason and subornation of perjury; but ought to take it up, to weigh the considerations which can be urged in their favor; and if there be none but those which are so eloquently set forth in the pamphlet I have quoted, these should be considered. If they have mistaken their remedy, the House should do as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Marshall] told us he was ready to do—admit the facts.

Mr. Gilmer, page 983, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That in presenting to the consideration of this House a petition for the dissolution of the Union the member from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] has justly incurred the censure of this House.

The following resolution was also introduced by Mr. Marshall of Kentucky:

Resolved, therefore, That Hon. John Q. Adams, a member from Massachusetts, in presenting for the consideration of the House of Representatives of the United States a petition praying the dissolution of the Union, has offered the deepest indignity to the House of which he is a member; an insult to the people of the United States, of which that House is the legislative organ; and will, if this outrage is permitted to pass unrebuked and unpunished, have disgraced his country, through their Representatives, in the eyes of the whole world.

Two weeks were exclusively devoted to Mr. Adams's trial, at the end of which the entire proceedings were laid on the table. I find the following note on page 236 of the Globe:

The trial of Mr. Adams, to the exclusion of all other business, commenced on the 25th of January, and terminated on the 7th of February, when the whole proceedings were laid on the table without deciding a single point. The expenses of the House during that time thus wasted exceeded $20,000.

The failure on the part of the House to even censure Mr. Adams was construed by many as an admission that Mr. Adams's construction was correct.

This sentiment in favor of secession continually gained strength, and five years later the Legislature of Massachusetts passed another secession resolution. I read from "Acts and resolutions passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts in the year 1844," page 319:

1. Resolved, That the power to unite an independent foreign State with the United States is not among the powers delegated to the General Government by the Constitution of the United States.

2. Resolved, * * * That the project of the annexation of Texas, unless arrested on the threshold, may drive these States into a dissolution of the Union.

3. Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolves to each of the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of this Commonwealth in the Congress of the United States.

4. Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit a copy of the same resolves to the Executive of the United States and of the several States.

Approved by the governor March 15, 1844.

A year later, February 22, 1845, the Legislature of Massachusetts celebrated Washington's birthday by passing still another secession resolution.

I read from the same volume, pages 598 and 599:

Resolved, That Massachusetts has never delegated the power to admit into the Union States or Territories without or beyond the original territory of the States and Territories belonging to the Union at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, * * * and as the powers of legislation granted in the Constitution of the United States to Congress do not embrace the case of the admission of a foreign state or foreign territory by legislation into the Union such an act of admission would have no binding force whatever on the people of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit copies of the preceding report and resolves to the President of the United States, the several Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth, and the governors of the several States.

Approved by the governor February 22, 1845.

I beg to call special attention to the second resolution, and also to that part of the third resolution which directed the governor to transmit copies of the resolution, etc. All this was a part of the history of our country when Mr. Lincoln was elected by the solid vote of the States of the North, opposed by the solid vote of the States of the South.

A large part of the Northern press contended that the States of the South had a full right to secede if the people desired to withdraw from the Union, and it was common to see in the Northern press the words:

Erring sisters go in peace.

THE NORTHERN PRESS ADVOCATES SECESSION.

Mr. Lincoln's election was fully known on the evening of November 8, 1860, and the next morning, November 9, Mr. Greeley's New York Tribune contained the following:

GOING TO GO.

If the cotton States shall become satisfied that they can do better out of the Union than in it, we insist on letting them go in peace. The right to secede may be a revolutionary one, but it exists nevertheless.

And again, in the same issue of his widely circulated and influential paper, Mr. Greeley said:

We must ever resist the asserted right of any State to remain in the Union and nullify or defy the laws thereof. To withdraw from the Union is quite another matter; and whenever a considerable section of our Union shall deliberately resolve to go out we shall resist all coercive measures designed to keep it in. We hope never to live in a republic whereof one section is pinned to the residue by bayonets. Let them have both sides of the question fully presented; let them reflect, deliberate, then vote; and let the action of secession be the echo of an unmistakable popular fiat. A judgment thus rendered, a demand for separation so backed, would either be acquiesced in without the effusion of blood, or those who rushed upon carnage to defy and defeat it would place themselves clearly in the wrong.

The New York Tribune of November 16, 1860, again announced their views to the Southern people in an article headed "Secession in practice," in which the paper used the following words:

Still we say in all earnestness and good faith, whenever a whole section of this Republic, whether a half, a third, or only a fourth, shall truly desire and demand a separation from the residue, we shall earnestly favor such separation. If the fifteen slave States, or even the eight cotton States alone, shall quietly, decisively say to the rest, "We prefer to be henceforth separated from you," we shall insist that they be permitted to go in peace. War is a hideous necessity at best, and a civil conflict, a war of estranged and embittered fellow-countrymen, is the most hideous of all wars. Whenever the people of the cotton States shall have definitively and decisively made up their minds to separate from the rest of us we shall urge that the proper steps be taken to give full effect to their decision.

Three days afterwards, on the 19th, the same paper uses these words:

Now, we believe and maintain that the Union is to be preserved only so long as it is beneficial and satisfactory to all parties concerned.

We do not believe that any man, any neighborhood, town, county, or even State may break up the Union in any transient gust of passion; we fully comprehend that secession is an extreme, an ultimate resort—not a constitutional but a revolutionary remedy. But we insist that this Union shall not be held together by force whenever it shall have ceased to cohere by the mutual attraction of its parts; and whenever the slave States or the cotton States only shall unitedly and coolly say to the rest, "We want to get out of the Union," we shall urge that their request be acceded to.

The New York Herald of Friday, November 23, 1860, said:

THE DISUNION QUESTION—A CONSERVATIVE REACTION IN THE SOUTH.

We publish this morning a significant letter from Governor Letcher, of Virginia, on the subject of the present disunion excitement in the South, Southern constitutional rights, Northern State acts of nullification, and the position of Virginia in this crisis. * * * To this end would it not be well for the conservative Union men of the city of New York to make a demonstration—a Northern movement of conciliation, concession, and harmony? Coercion in any event is out of the question. A union held together by the bayonet would be nothing better than a military despotism. Conciliation and harmony, through mutual concessions, in a reconstruction of the fundamental law, between the North and the South, will restore and perpetuate the Union contemplated by the fathers. So, now that the conservative men of the South are moving, let the Union men of the North second their endeavors, and let New York, as in the compromises of 1850, lead the way.

And on the following day, November 24, the Tribune says:

FEDERAL COERCION.

Some of the Washington correspondents telegraph that Mr. Buchanan is attempting to map out a middle course in which to steer his bark during the tempest which now howls about him. He is to condemn the asserted right of secession, but to assert in the same breath that he is opposed to keeping a State in the Union by what he calls Federal coercion. Now, we have no desire to prevent secession by coercion, but we hold this position to be utterly unsupported by law or reason.

I will also quote an article from the New York Daily Tribune, Friday, November 30, 1860:

ARE WE GOING TO FIGHT?

But if the cotton States generally unite with her in seceding, we insist that they can not be prevented, and that the attempt must not be made. Five millions of people, more than half of them of the dominant race, of whom at least half a million are able and willing to shoulder muskets, can never be subdued while fighting around and over their own hearthstones. If they could be they would no longer be equal members of the Union, but conquered dependencies. * * * We propose to wrest this potent engine from the disunionists by saying frankly to the slave States:

"If you choose to leave the Union, leave it, but let us have no quarrel about it. If you think it a curse to you and an unfair advantage to us, repudiate it and see if you are not mistaken. If you are better by yourselves, go and God speed you. For our part we have done very well with you and are quite willing to keep along with you, but if the association is irksome to you, we have too much self-respect to insist on its continuance. We have lived by our industry thus far and hope to do so still, even though you leave us."

We repeat, that only the sheen of Northern bayonets can bind the South wholly to the evils of secession, but that may do it. Let us be patient, neither speaking daggers nor using them, standing to our principles but not to our arms, and all will yet be well.

I will read an extract from an editorial in the New York Times of December 3, 1860:

By common consent, moreover, the most prominent and tangible point of offense seems to be the legislation growing out of the fugitive-slave law. Several of the Northern States have passed personal-liberty bills, with the alleged intent to prevent the return of fugitive slaves to their masters.

From Union men in every quarter of the South come up the most earnest appeals to the Northern States to repeal these laws. Such an act, we are assured, would have a powerful effect in disarming the disunion clamor in nearly all the Southern States and in promoting the prospects of a peaceful adjustment of all pending differences.

The next day, December 4, the New York Times publishes another article, in which it says:

Mr. Weed has stated his opinion of the crisis thus:

1. There is imminent danger of a dissolution of the Union.

2. The danger originated in the ambition and cupidity of men who desire a Southern despotism, and in the fanatic zeal of the Northern Abolitionists who seek the emancipation of slaves regardless of consequences.

3. The danger can only be averted by such moderation and forbearance as will draw out, strengthen, and combine the Union sentiment of the whole country.

Each of these statements will command general assent.

The only question likely to arise relates to the practical measures by which the "moderation and forbearance" can be displayed.

And while the South Carolina convention was in session and before any State had seceded and when it was doubted by many whether such action would be taken, Mr. Greeley said:

If it (the Declaration of Independence) justifies the secession from the British empire of three millions of colonists in 1776, we do not see why it would not justify the secession of five millions of Southrons from the Federal Union in 1861. If we are mistaken on this point, why does not some one attempt to show wherein and why? For our own part, while we deny the right of slaveholders to hold slaves against the will of the latter, we can not see how twenty millions of people can rightfully hold ten, or even five, in a detested Union with them by military force.

In the same issue of Mr. Greeley's paper we read the following:

If seven or eight contiguous States shall present themselves authentically at Washington, saying: "We hate the Federal Union; we have withdrawn from it; we will give you the choice between acquiescing in our secession and arranging amicably all incidental questions on the one hand and attempting to subdue us on the other," we could not stand up for coercion, for subjugation, for we do not think it would be just. We hold the right of self-government even when invoked in behalf of those who deny it to others. So much for the question of principle.

This conservative view of the question which Mr. Greeley gave to the world with such emphasis and in which he expressed his opinion of the principle involved was reiterated for days, weeks, and months with the characteristic persistence of that able leader.

Mr. Greeley also said:

Any attempt to compel them by force to remain would be contrary to the principles enunciated in the immortal Declaration of Independence, contrary to the fundamental ideas on which human liberty is based.

These articles continued to appear in the Northern press for months after the election of Mr. Lincoln and until after most of the Southern States had seceded. They continued until after the people of the South had adopted a constitution and organized their new Confederate government; after they had raised and equipped an army, appointed ambassadors to foreign courts, and convened a congress; after they had taken possession of three-fourths of the arsenals and forts within their territory, enrolled her as one of the nations of the earth.

After all this, Mr. Greeley's paper continued to indorse the action of the Southern people as fully as it was possible for language to enable it to do so. Mr. Greeley said:

We have repeatedly said, and we once more insist, that the great principle embodied by Jefferson in the Declaration of American Independence, that governments derive their just powers from consent of the governed is sound and just; and that if the slave States, the cotton States, or the Gulf States only choose to form an independent nation they have a clear, moral right to do so. Whenever it shall be clear that the great body of Southern people have become conclusively alienated from the Union and anxious to escape from it, we will do our best to forward their views.

Mr. Greeley was earnestly and ably supported in his views by the most prominent men and able editors of Republican papers all over the North.

I cite the following from the Commercial, which was certainly the leading Republican paper of Ohio. After Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated the Commercial said:

We are not in favor of blockading the Southern coast. We are not in favor of retaking by force the property of the United States now in possession of the seceders. We would recognize the existence of a government formed of all the slaveholding States and attempt to cultivate amicable relations with it.

In addition to all this, the commander of the Federal Army, Gen. Winfield Scott, was very emphatic in indorsing the views of the New York Tribune and other papers, to the effect that secession was the proper course for the Southern people to pursue, and his oft-repeated expression,

Wayward sisters depart in peace, seemed to meet the full approval of the great body of the people of the North. In obedience to all this advice, the Southern States did secede, and almost immediately the vast Federal armies were raised, battles were fought, money expended, and this, let me tell my friend from New York, was the cause of the vast appropriations regarding which he asked an explanation.

These appropriations were made to carry on the most stupendous war recorded in modern history. From April 15, 1861, to the close of the war there was called into the service of the United States 2,865,028 soldiers. Besides this, we have had evidence placed before Congress of numerous organizations called into service by the governors or other officials of border States which would probably number 500,000 men.

That these men were brave is proven by the terrible casualties of the battles which they fought.

The struggle from May 5 to May 12, 1864, at the Wilderness and Spottsylvania, which should really be called one battle, was a good index of the sanguinary character of the conflict.

The losses of Grant's army in that conflict, as reported in Scribner's statistical record, was 9,774 killed, 41,150 wounded, and 13,254 missing.

It gives an idea of the magnitude of this conflict to recall that Gen. Grant's loss in killed and wounded in this battle was greater than the loss in killed and wounded in all the battles of all the wars in this country prior to 1861.

The loss in all the battles of the seven years of the Revolution was 2,200 killed and 6,500 wounded.

The loss in the army of 1812 was 1,877 killed and 3,737 wounded.

The loss in the war with Mexico was 1,049 killed and 7,929 wounded; in all, only 19,227 men.

Now, if we add all the losses of the Indian wars, including the French and Indian war, the entire loss would be less than half the killed and wounded in this great battle.

As another evidence of the gallantry of the officers and soldiers, I will mention that during that war forty-six generals of the United States Army and seventy-six generals of the Confederate army were killed at the head of their commands in battle.

I have given an explanation of this matter to the best of my ability and from the standpoint of one whose feelings were and are in entire sympathy with the Southern people, but who since the close of that war has been as devoted to the Union of the States and the prosperity, welfare, and glory of our country as the most distinguished soldier who fought in the Federal army from 1861 to 1865.

Mr. MARTIN. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: With forty or fifty bills on the Private Calendar do not you think now it would be better to not to go into these general remarks——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I shall occupy the floor but a few minutes longer. I did not intend to occupy so much of the time of the committee.

It seemed very clear to me from the discussion in the House that the purposes of the bill was not understood. I know all will concur with me that, where a man enlists as a soldier and serves in battle after battle for two and a half years, it would be a gross injustice to place upon him and his children the stigma of desertion, when in fact he was absent under circumstances which by no means justified that charge.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. For I beg to say to the gentleman—and he knows that I do not say this in unkindness, as I have the very highest respect for him—that if our sessions are to be taken up with general discussions, there will be no possible chance of securing action on any of these bills. What, then, will become of them?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I shall not occupy more than three or four minutes.

The House had commenced a general discussion before I took the floor, and my friend knows that when a discussion of this kind commences it continues until the time for adjournment.

My distinguished friend from Indiana, I know, will admit that I am not at all responsible for the length of the discussion. He will admit that my speech was directly in line with the business before the House to-night, and that it would have been very brief had not the gentleman insisted on my explaining the cause for the enormous appropriations during the period from 1861 to 1865. I was going on, Mr. Chairman, to state the expenditures from 1865 down to the present time, but I will print the figures with my remarks. These expenditures are as follows:

Mr. CURTIS of New York. They were raised under compulsion; we were not answerable for them.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I can not admit that. The expenditures during these years averaged annually $300,850.97.

I will now present a table which I have prepared, giving the expenses of every branch of our Government for each of the three periods I have mentioned, namely, the period before the war, the period during the war, and the period since the war. This shows that the total expenditures of our Government from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1894, have amounted to the enormous sum of $14,870,959,696.85. The table is as follows:

I desire to call especial attention to the fact developed by this table, that when the Democratic party came into control of the Forty-fourth Congress they reduced the regular annual appropriations $32,000,000 below the average appropriations by Republicans during the five preceding years. And again, that when Republicans fell into control of the Fifty-first Congress they increased appropriations $160,000 a year above the average appropriations by the seven preceding Democratic Congresses.

During the five years immediately preceding the Forty-fourth Congress, the average regular annual appropriations by Republicans were .. $181,826,321.52
The Democrats then came into control of the House of Representatives and immediately reduced the regular annual appropriations to .. 149,572,894.44
Thus making an annual saving of 32,253,427.08
The Republicans again came into control of all branches of the Government in the Forty-seventh Congress and they immediately increased the annual average appropriations to 264,652,624.96
This was an annual average increase by Republicans in excess of Democratic appropriations of 86,034,554.04
In the Forty-eighth Congress the Democrats again had control of the House and they immediately reduced the annual average appropriations to 212,652,935.63
Thus making an annual saving to the people of .. 51,999,689.33
During the six years of Democratic rule in the House of Representatives, following the Forty-seventh Congress, the average annual appropriations were 253,587,560.05
The Republicans then obtained control in the Fifty-first, commonly called "the Reed Congress," and immediately increased the average annual appropriations to 382,150,961.17
Which was an increase above the average annual appropriations during the preceding six years, when the House was controlled by Democrats, of 128,563,401.12
For the first time in a third of a century the Democrats now have control of all branches of the Government, and notwithstanding Republican laws, which compel them to appropriate $151,581,570 for pensions, and notwithstanding many other expenses made necessary by Republican laws, they have succeeded in reducing appropriations, as they passed the House, to .. 380,107,455.24
A reduction below the appropriations of the "Reed Congress" of $2,043,505.93

In these calculations I have confined the figures to the annual appropriations by Congress, regarding that as the most just method of comparison. If we should include permanent appropriations, the comparison of the present Congress with the "Reed" Congress will be as follows:

Reed Congress, first session 463,398,510.79
Reed Congress, second session 525,018,672.55
Present Congress, second session 481,182,135.24
The appropriations this year would be much less, but the appropriations for pensions exceed that of the first session of the Reed Congress by .. 27,822,201.65
And the appropriation for the Post-Office by the present Congress exceeds that of the Reed Congress for the same purpose by 15,013,900.56
Most of which latter sum will be returned to the Treasury.

The figures given in the above table show the appropriations as the bills passed the House of Representatives.

The present status of these bills is as follows:

As reported to the Senate:
Indian 9,327,386.69
As passed the Senate:
Agriculture 4,225,183.06
Army bill 23,611,384.68
Diplomatic 1,591,218.27
District of Columbia 5,887,088.57
Fortifications 2,836,604.00
Legislative 21,378,665.79
Navy 25,327,126.72
Pensions 151,581,570.00
River and Harbor 12,946,680.00
As enacted into law:
Military Academy 405,523.08
Post-Office 87,236,599.55

EXPENDITURES BY STATES.

I will now give an interesting table showing the total amount of money expended by State, county, city, and town governments, as reported for the census year 1890. It will be seen that the total expenditure of this character by all the States amounted that year to $569,252,634, which when added to the $318,040,710 expended that year by the General Government makes the grand total of expenses of the Federal, State, and local governments $887,293,344. The table is as follows:

c Amount expended for colleges, academies, normal schools, and other educational purposes not included.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman please print also the proportion of vetoes of pension bills by different administrations.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I had forgotten it. I desire to state as a matter of fact that Mr. Cleveland signed more bills for pensions to Federal soldiers than any President who preceded him.

I will now present a table showing the receipts and expenditures of the Federal, State, and local governments, including the deficiency in postal service. In order to get these facts I have corrected some errors made by the Census Office; for instance, they put down $66,259,547 as expended for the postal service that year when it should have been only $6,100,000, that being the total sum paid by the Treasury to make up deficiencies in the postal revenues.

I will now collate these figures, so as to show the receipts and expenditures of the Federal, State, and local governments during the census year 1890, distributed by divisions. The receipts were as follows:

United States Government, excluding postal revenues	$403,090,982
States, Territories, and District of Columbia	116,157,640
Counties, partly estimated	133,525,493
Municipalities, partly estimated	329,635,200
Total	982,390,315

The expenditures were as follows:

United States Government, including postal service deficiencies	$318,040,710
States, Territories, and District of Columbia, except for public schools	77,105,911
Counties, except for public schools, partly estimated	114,573,401

Public schools	139,065,537
Miscellaneous	5,517,182
Total	887,293,344

I desire to call attention to the fact that the very largest item of expenditure is for pensioning soldiers. I also desire to call the attention of my single-tax friends to the great amount of money that is now collected from real estate. The amount of taxes on real estate and personal property was not separately reported to the Census Office, but the real estate was assessed at $18,956,556,675, and the personal property at $6,516,616,743; the total value would therefore be $25,473,173,418, showing that $329,742,400 is derived from a direct tax upon lands, etc.

I will now present a very interesting table showing the receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department from June 30, 1865, to June 30, 1894.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

It will be observed in the above table of Government expenditures that there is no column showing the expenditures for the postal service. This is accounted for from the fact that the receipts in that Department have very nearly met the expenditures, and the small deficiency is included in the column headed "miscellaneous." For instance, the appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1894, was $84,004,314.22, and the revenues of the Department so nearly paid the expenses that they were only compelled to take from the Treasury $8,250,000. In order to illustrate the wonderful growth of the postal service, I have prepared a table showing the revenue and the expenditures for each year since the war, and also the amount which was taken from the Treasury each year to meet the deficiency in the revenues.

The first column of the table shows the total receipts or revenue of the Post-Office Department from the year ending June 30, 1865, to June 30, 1894. The second column gives the expenditures for those years, and the third column the amount drawn from the Treasury to make up the deficiency. The reason why this third column differs in some instances from the actual deficiency is that sometimes at the end of the year the money on hand exceeds unpaid liabilities, and sometimes the condition is the reverse.

The table is as follows:

I desire to call attention to the marvelous and gratifying growth of the postal service. It is pleasing to observe that, notwithstanding the reduction in the postal charges, the constantly increasing facilities, the rapid and frequent mails, the free delivery and other conveniences, involving immense expenditures, increasing as they have from $15,332,079 in 1866 to the enormous sum of $84,212,057 in 1894, the receipts have kept pace with the disbursements, and the percentage of deficiency is much less now than it was a quarter of a century ago.

Now, with the permission of the House to print these tables, I will yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print the tables and documents to which he has referred as an addition to his remarks. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman have any objection to say now, since he has made his speech, which side of this question he is on? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am a member of that committee which reported this bill; and I wish to say to the gentleman that we examine all these questions thoroughly; and that we report against possibly nine out of ten that come before us. We take a judicial view of them. There is no partisanship in that committee, and when we report a case it is because we believe it to be proper to report. We are satisfied with the evidence on which it is based, and for that reason feel that we can recommend it to the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Are you for this bill?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; I certainly favor the charge of desertion being removed from this man's record.

Mr. HEPBURN. All of us on this side of the House are with the gentleman from Alabama on this question, and if he will attend to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] we will get along with this case very quickly. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will say in reply to the gentleman that the gentleman from Virginia and our friends of the South, as I have shown, are better friends of the Federal soldier than gentlemen on the other side of the House. [Laughter.] They seek to give a pension to every soldier who deserves it; and in order to do this they sometimes feel it their duty to object to pensions that it seems to them are simply proposed to pay for political partisanship.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that this is one of those cases?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not intimate it at all, sir. I certainly have made no such intimation in my speech.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do you think it is?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I can not say what the purpose was in introducing this bill, but I do know that the evidence in this case shows that the beneficiary is not a deserter.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope our friends on the other side will not delay action on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Alabama to ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy much of the time of the committee, yet I desire to offer a few general observations in reply to some of the statements made by my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES], as well as some of those of my friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

I am a member of the committee that reported this bill, as well as my friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], who has just delivered a carefully prepared set speech. I want to call attention to this broad fact: That of all the reports made to this House from the standing committees there is hardly one that is questioned, its conclusions opposed, or a contest made over the evidence presented, except the reports from the Committee on Pensions, the Committee on Invalid Pensions, or those from the Committee on Military Affairs in favor of the removal of the charge of desertion.

These committees are composed of as creditable and as well-informed men as those who compose the other standing committees of the House. The object of the opposition of my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and others is too evident to require further reference.

Now, my friend from Alabama comes here with a carefully prepared speech for the purpose of informing the House and the country as to the action of the two great parties in appropriating moneys for the payment of pensions, with the express purpose of extolling the generosity and fidelity of the Democratic party to the old soldiers.

I have no doubt that my friend, competent as he is to judge, aware, as he doubtless is, of the bad effect upon the country of these fruitless efforts in every Friday night session to pass bills granting pensions to those who are deserving, has thought it necessary for him or some other conspicuous leader of the Democratic party to come before this House and explain why pensions are not granted in deserving cases, and to substitute instead of a frank explanation an ingeniously constructed speech to extol the record of the party with which he affiliates in making appropriations in the past. My friend commences his statement with the annual appropriations for pensions following the close of the war and continues them to the present year, a most valuable contribution, I admit.

There were during the first decade after the war comparatively few pensions granted. They were increased in the second decade and quadrupled in the third decade. The pension list has steadily grown in the progress of years since the war; and the injuries these men received in the prosecution of that war have increased in arithmetical proportion. That party which my friend calls the party of extravagance is the party that placed on the statute books the laws under which were granted the pensions which have been paid, and it does seem to be a piece of extravagant generosity for a member of the Democratic party to come into the House and claim special consideration for that party because it did not neglect the duty imposed upon it to appropriate the moneys to pay the pensions which had been granted under laws enacted by the Republican party.

The laws that the Republican party placed upon the statute books granting to those who had suffered in defending the Union required large appropriations, and my friend, Gen. WHEELER, claims special credit for his party for appropriating money to defray the legitimate expenditures of the Government.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, all appropriations for this purpose will be carefully considered and duly estimated for in the future. Whether we should go into a discussion of the war and the reasons which impelled those who inaugurated it to do so, I will not stop to consider.

I am sure there is no desire on my part to enter upon that discussion although the necessity for the granting of these pensions is the direct outgrowth of that war. I will gladly come here and listen to him while he states the policy of his party in regard to the granting of pensions, and I will be glad to hear from him or other prominent leader of that party any explanation they have to make for refusing to grant those meritorious cases which do not come under the general law.

Mr. Chairman, we have been in session nearly a year, and I doubt if we have sent to the Senate more than one pension case a week during all of that time. Who are responsible for the failure to pass these bills? These committees have been appointed by a Democratic Speaker. A majority of the members of the Invalid Pensions Committee, of the Pension Committee, and of the Committee on Military Affairs, belong to the dominant party, yet when these committees favorably report bills to the House, men rise here on every Friday night to contest the judgment of the committee, dispute the evidence on which these reports are made and forget during the day sessions of the week to call in question a single report from any other of the committees that come before the House for its action.

The attention of the House has been called to this subject by the explanation of my friend from Alabama. I wish to call your attention to the fact that an explanation has been made. There are strong reasons why an explanation should be given the country, and I think we ought to give an ample opportunity to my friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], or any other gentleman who comes here for that purpose. It will be useful to that party, and may possibly contribute to its success, to explain why it is that one or two gentlemen, members in good standing in the Democratic party, are permitted to block the consideration of all pension legislation in this House.

My friend from Alabama, I am glad to say, does not take that position, and I am glad to say also that few of his associates do. It defeats all legislation, when a quorum is not present, for a single man to stand up in opposition to the consideration of a bill. I acquit almost all who come here from any such purpose, but if we have one or two or three who assume the responsibility of defeating bills by calling a quorum to save the Government the trifling expenditure necessary to meet the payment of just pensions, they, and they who are responsible for their action, are the men who ought to be allowed an opportunity to explain.

It is for that reason and that reason only that I have thought fit in this manner, without preparation, to call the attention of the House to the underlying reason why my friend has brought into the House a mantle to cover their neglect to do the plain duty which the rules of the House have prescribed, and which each Congress has done without exception for thirty years; that is, to give in these Friday night sessions consideration of pension cases not covered by any general law, and to remove charges of desertion which are not necessarily true cases of desertion, but to correct records by competent testimony to enable claimants to have their claims considered on their merits with a full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. MCNAGNY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MCNAGNY. Do you think it good faith to charge a great party with obstructive tactics set on foot by two or at most three individuals, when the bulk of the party is ready and willing to act in accordance with the suggestions the gentleman has made and with your side of the House in the passage of such measures? I say, do you think that quite fair?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be understood, and I believe my language will conclusively show that I have said that I thought it was pertinent and proper for some representative of the dominant party in the House to come forward and explain why it is that party allows one, two, or three persons to stand up and thwart all legislation of this character and bring members here week after week, and send them back without being able to perform the duty that brought them here.

Mr. MCNAGNY. Will you pardon a further observation?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Certainly, sir.

Mr. MCNAGNY. I think it will be found, Mr. Chairman, that the Democratic party, the great patriotic party which it is, repudiates and condemns the obstructive tactics which have been brought forward here night after night for almost a year upon the subject of pensions [applause]; that that party is not in sympathy with them; that that party is in favor of granting pensions to every Union soldier who needs them, and to his wife and to his orphaned children; that that party is in accord with the patriotic sentiment of the country which demands that the pension policy shall be carried forward until every soldier and his widow and his orphan children shall be dealt with by this Government in a spirit of exact justice and right.

And you will pardon me for saying that the Democratic party does not approve of these obstructive tactics; that the Democratic party repudiates them, and that it is wrong and unjust to charge that party with such tactics which are set on foot by two or three individuals who in this connection do not speak for the Democratic party, who have no right to speak for it, who do not bind it and can not bind it, either in the great forum of public opinion, or on the floor of this House; and I for one denounce the charge as untrue that the Democratic party is in the attitude of opposing the granting of pensions in any just and worthy case. Pardon me for having interrupted so long. [Applause.]

Mr. CURTIS of New York. In answer to my friend's last interruption, I call attention to the fact that this night, for the first time in a year, has a leading Democrat, a man of conspicuous ability and high character—who has shown it not only in this House, but elsewhere—come forward to make an explanation and tell the country that the Democratic party has excelled all others in the discharge of its duty to the soldiers. I simply, in further reply to my friend, call attention to the fact that one, two, or three persons in that party have been able to stand up session after session and thwart all its noble purposes, which my friend would have us understand exist, and which we gratefully acknowledge.

Heretofore party leaders have been silent, and now for the first time has an excuse been brought forward in the nature of a shield and a cover for these obstructive acts which have continued uncondemned until the closing days of the session. In view of these facts I do not feel it improper to say that I welcome the opportunity which my friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has had of disclaiming his approval of the objective tactics and of offering the excuse which he has offered for the neglect of this Congress for a whole year to discharge the responsibilities which have been thrown upon it under the rules of the House and upon the committee which its Speaker has appointed. It is well known where the responsibility rests for the failure of this House to consider pension bills.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. So far as I know, the gentleman from Alabama is the only gentleman present who represents the Committee on Military Affairs. He is the only one whom I have heard mention the fact of being a member of that committee. Now, do I understand the gentleman to say, in speaking of this claim, that his committee generally examined these cases carefully, or do I understand him to go further and to say he has personally examined this case carefully?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will state that every bill is brought before a subcommittee, and then before the full committee, and is read and examined by the full committee; and I regard the investigation there made as being as careful as the investigation which chancellors devote to the cases that come before them.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has not answered my question. My question is whether he has made any personal examination of this case; not what the committee usually does, but whether the gentleman himself has personally examined the testimony bearing upon this case?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I can not say that I recall now, in the numerous cases that have been before the committee, hearing this case read, but I have read the report since, and I feel confident that every paper was critically examined.

Mr. JONES. I understood the gentleman to say that of the numerous bills introduced in this House and referred to his committee, the committee reject nine out of ten of the bills as being without merit.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the gentleman that this report shows that this man, who claims to have been sick during the year that he was charged with being home as a deserter, did not make application to the Pension Department, which had jurisdiction of this matter, until the 20th of September, 1886, over twenty-two years after the charge of desertion was made against him.

Mr. BRYAN. Is there any evidence that he knew that the charge was standing against him?

Mr. JONES. There is this evidence. that he considered himself a wounded and maimed soldier, and there is a statement made by a gentleman on this floor that he is and has been, as the result of these wounds then received, absolutely in need of a pension. And I take it for granted that if he was absolutely in need of a pension; that if he was wounded at the battle of Murfreesboro, and suffered from these wounds all the time, and was unable to support himself, he would not have deferred for twenty-two years putting himself in a position to receive a pension.

He would not have put off until all the witnesses who could testify had disappeared or died and until he could only produce two witnesses who had barely heard him declare he had been wounded in battle.

Mr. RAY. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman may.

Mr. RAY. Perhaps you are not aware of the fact that there have been hundreds, and perhaps I may truthfully say thousands, of Union soldiers who did not know that they were reported as deserters until ten, fifteen, or twenty years after the war closed.

I have a case in mind which, if the gentleman will pardon me, I should like to call his attention to. A widow in my county applied for a pension on account of the death of her husband.

She was married to him and he went into the Army a young man. She never heard of him after the second battle of Manassas, and she supposed he was dead. She made an application for pension, and it was finally reported to her that she could not have it for the reason that her husband was a deserter. It appeared that he was so entered upon the roll. Now, on looking that case up, evidence was produced, and there was no contradiction, that the soldier was left under a tree in the night at the close of the battle with a bullet through his body. That is the last that was ever heard of him. The soldier was borne upon the roll as a deserter.

Now, what would you say about that, assuming all these facts to be true? You would say, of course, that it was an unjust charge; and I might go on with a dozen and even a score of cases of that kind. I simply speak of this to call your attention to the fact that this charge of desertion was an easy one to make, where the sergeant, or the captain, or the colonel did not know that the soldier had been killed; and when he did not answer the roll call they would very probably enter him as a deserter, when, in point of fact, he might be wounded or be sick somewhere in hospital.

Mr. JONES. I would say in reply to what the gentleman from New York has said that the case he has cited is an exceedingly exceptional one, in my opinion. I will say further in substantiation of that position, that there have been a number of bills of this sort before the Committee of the Whole; a number of reports have been read; and in nearly every one of those cases it has been urged in behalf of the applicant that when he deserted it was after the war had actually closed and there was no command to which he could report; and that if he deserted it was not until after the war was practically over; or that he did not know the charge was against him.

Most of the cases that we have had under consideration were cases of that sort. This man deserted in the very flood tide of the war. He deserted when the war was at its very height. He deserted in April, 1864, and went back to the State of Massachusetts, and according to his own testimony he had recovered before the close of the war. The war had not ended. The war had not ended on the 12th of May, 1865; and according to his own testimony he was not sick over twelve months. He did not, therefore, return to his command, if we can take his own statement, when he was able to do so.

The affidavits are given twenty-two years after the desertion, one of them given nearly thirty years after the desertion. If this man was suffering from rheumatism or malaria, he could easily have furnished his commander or the War Department with an affidavit or certificate of the fact. It does not appear.

The gentleman says that he never offered any excuse for his conduct, because he may not have known that this charge of desertion was against him. Upon that point I wish to say that every report that has been before us, where the facts justified such a statement, contained that statement. It is strange that it is omitted in this one if there was any testimony to justify it.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the statute.

Mr. JONES. This report contains a little over twelve lines, and five and one-half of those lines are taken up with the statement of the bill and amendment, which provides that no pay, bounty, or emolument shall become due. There are actually only six and one-half lines of this report; and it is upon the statement contained in six and one-half lines that we are asked, upon the testimony of this man—the deserter himself—to remove the charge of desertion. I take it that if he had not known the charge of desertion was resting against him, in some among the many affidavits he filed he would have stated that fact as some extenuation of his delinquency in making this application.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman urged the fact that this application was not filed until September, 1886, as a circumstance against the claim. Now, is not that all explained away by the fact that the act under which this man made the application was not passed until May 17, 1886? Up to that date there was no law authorizing the application to be made to the Secretary of War for the removal of the charge of desertion in these cases; and this soldier made his application within a few months after the passage of the act.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman refer to the application for the removal of the charge of desertion, or to the application for a pension?

Mr. LACEY. The removal of the charge of desertion.

Mr. JONES. What was in the way of his making to Congress such an application as he now makes? Why has he neglected to make this application for nearly thirty years?

Mr. LACEY. I do not know as to that; but he did make his application to the War Department within a very few months after the act was passed.

Now, let me call attention to a further fact. This case does not rest on this man's testimony alone. Dr. Paige swears that he treated him in April and May, 1864, and from that time until the close of the war, and that he was suffering from debility and malaria and malarial poisoning during all that time. So that in fact he never deserted at all.

Mr. JONES. In reply to that, I will say that this doctor made two affidavits. The first affidavit covered only April and May of 1864; and the man's furlough did not expire until May 12, 1864, so that the whole of the treatment as set forth in the first affidavit may have been during the thirty days that he was on furlough.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him again?

Mr. JONES. Wait a moment. Subsequently this doctor filed a supplemental or additional affidavit—nearly thirty years after the service was rendered—in which he says that he treated the man during the remainder of 1864 and 1865 for debility and malaria. But he nowhere states in his affidavit that the applicant was unable to return to his command on account of the disease from which he was suffering. I infer from this omission that he went just as far as a regard for the truth would permit him to go.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman, in his anxiety to discredit the testimony of Dr. Paige, misquotes it. It is nowhere reported here that Dr. Paige said in his first affidavit that he treated this man in April and May; and the statement is that he treated the soldier in May and at other times in 1864; and then in his second affidavit the doctor says that the soldier "was not able to leave his bed when his furlough expired, and was sick for about a year, and could then get about only on crutches." This is the doctor's testimony.

Let me correct the gentleman further with reference to his statement that this man had said that his diseased condition existed only until May 12, 1865. There is nothing of that kind in the affidavit. The gentleman misquotes it. On the contrary, he says that—

About April, 1864, he obtained a furlough for thirty days, being unfit for duty, and went home; that he became much worse and was under the medical treatment of one Dr. Paige; that he remained under Dr. Paige's treatment until his regiment was mustered out of service.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman tell me where the language "he became much worse" is found in this report?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is in this man's testimony. I have just quoted it.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman show it to me? I do not see it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I read it again:

That he became much worse, and was under the medical treatment of one Dr. Paige.

I do not wonder that the gentleman misquotes, if he is unable to read the printed language of the report.

Mr. JONES. This is what the report says:

That while there—

At his home—

he was taken sick, was treated by Dr. Paige, was not able to leave his bed when his furlough expired, and was sick about a year, and could then get about only on crutches.

That is the man's own testimony.

Mr. LOUD. I ask that general debate be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I object.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say one single word in regard to the question at issue to-night. I did not come here with the intention of making a speech; but I can not sit down here quietly under the innuendoes and insinuations that have been thrown out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] against possibly two or three members of the Democratic party, who he says have come here Friday night after Friday night and thrown themselves as obstructionists across the path of giving pensions, as he says, to deserving Union soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, I deny it. I say, sir, that no member of the Democratic party, nor two, nor three, nor four, have done any such thing. I deny that any member of the Democratic party has come here and opposed a single deserving pension that ought to have been given to a Union soldier. But, Mr. Chairman, I do say that several of us—and I have helped to do it—have come here and interposed our objections against robbing the United States Treasury under the pretended head of pensioning deserters, coffee-coolers, bounty-jumpers, and men who really ought to have been shot before or since the war ended.

I say I will not sit down here and be quiet under any such imputations or any such insinuations. It is not true, and they have not done it. And I want to say that I have not one single word to take back that I have uttered on this floor against pensioning any deserter, or any person who I thought was not entitled to a pension. I stand by every word. And, Mr. Chairman, I still say as long as God shall let me live and I can come here on Friday night, I shall not allow, if I can help it by fair and honorable means, a single pension to be granted to a man whom I believe was a deserter, and who skulked off like a coward instead of facing the enemy like an honest, brave, patriotic soldier.

I say that it is unjust to try to cast this odium upon the Democratic party here or any portion of it. Over $150,000,000 have been freely voted by the Democratic Congress to pension Union soldiers for next the year; a more liberal appropriation than has ever been granted by any nation upon the face of the earth.

I have been here, Mr. Chairman, every single Friday night since I have been a member of this honorable body; and on every occasion, while I have not the figures at hand, there were nearly twice as many Democrats present as Republicans. Now, then, who is staying away to prevent a quorum when we have twice as many Democrats here as Republicans on every Friday night.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. You ought to have, when you have about 100 majority.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Where are the Republicans? Where is the gallant Mr. REED? Where is the gallant Mr. BURROWS? Where are they? Where are the Democrats? Where are all of the members of this body, Democrats, Republicans, and Populists, whose duty it is to come here not only in the day but in the night to furnish a quorum; not only to pass pension bills but other legislation. I say they will have to give up their euchre parties and entertainments and give up their claw-hammer coats and come here and give the Union soldiers their pensions, if they are just.

I feel that it is sheer hypocrisy to stand up here and charge upon the Democratic party the onus of having denied pensions. It is not so. It is not true. Where to-day are a number of Republicans and Democrats, and Populists, too. Numbers of them are in their districts building fences, when it is their sworn duty to be here in their seats. Numbers of them, when they have unfulfilled pledges, are at home making more pledges, and piling them up, instead of being here fulfilling pledges already made to their constituents by the score.

The charge is right there, and not against those who come here every night and are willing to make a quorum. I have voted on every question since I have been a member, and I stand ready to make a quorum on either one side or the other; and if gentlemen on the Democratic side and gentlemen on the Republican side will quit their hypocritical cant and nonsensical stuff and show their devotion to the soldier by coming here in sufficient numbers they can pass pension bills, for they can pension even the dogs if they wish, because a majority will always vote for pensions. But they do not come. Let them come here and do their duty, and either "put up or shut up."

Now, we are in a tremendous condition in this House, which reminds me of what I once heard a preacher say of one of his congregation. He said: "Now, I want to preach to all good Christians a little while; and I want all of those who are not good Christians to get out; and I will pause for them to get out." Not a single man stirred. "Well," he says, "I want to preach to all sinners; and all those who are good Christians and not sinners will please get up and go out." Not a single soul moved. "Well," he says, "I want to preach to all those who are neither sinners nor good Christians, but those who are lukewarm; all those who are good Christians and sinners will get out." Not a soul stirred. The preacher was nonplussed. Then he got up and said: "You are in a hell of a fix." [Laughter.]

So it is with a number of us. Dozens of members are at home——

A MEMBER. "In a hell of a fix." [Great laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina (continuing). Making more promises. A number of my Republican friends are doing the same thing, and a number of my Democratic friends and my Populist friends are doing the same thing. Here we are without a quorum on account of members at home "fencing." And I think the people and our constituencies are like that preacher found his congregation, they are "in a hell of a fix." [Renewed laughter.] So, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a call of the House and send out at once to the saloons all over the city and to the euchre parties and bring the soldier-lovers here and let us pension the soldiers or stop this hypocritical cant on these Friday night sessions or give up these meetings entirely. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word in reply——

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PICKLER. I think the rule says that a member shall not speak more than once. Now, the gentleman has spoken several times on this bill; and I make the point that he is out of order. He has spoken three, four, or five times.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reply to what the gentleman from South Dakota has said, that only to-day a certain gentleman addressed the House a dozen times on the same proposition and that he is given to breaking daily the very rule he now would invoke against me.

I understood the Chair to rule a few nights ago, when this rule was invoked, that it never had been put in practice in the Committee of the Whole, and that the Chairman did not desire to do it, and would not do it on that occasion; and I hope the Chair will not now undertake to enforce a rule of that sort. If the Chair does, I for one will see that it is enforced on all future occasions; I for one will see to it that the gentleman who has raised this point against me does not address the House as many times in the future as he has in the past.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not make the same speech every time, as you do. I say something different. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. That is so, no doubt, in the gentleman's own estimation. I presume there are some people on this floor, however, who would not bear him out in this statement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a few minutes on the question before the House [cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"], and I ask the Chair to rule upon the point raised.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the point. I hope the gentleman will be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is withdrawn.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what my friend from New York [Mr. CURTIS] has said as to the attitude of some gentlemen on this side of the House who have seen proper to object to the passage of some of these bills, I want to say that I am one of those gentlemen who have indulged in the practice which the gentleman thinks the Democratic party would not like to be responsible for, and on that point I wish to assure him that I do not ask the Democratic party or the Republican party or any other party to be responsible for my action in the House of Representatives.

I shall always exercise my constitutional right to oppose bad legislation, whether it comes in the shape of pension bills or in any other shape. A vicious pension bill has no more right to consideration than any other vicious measure, although some people draw a distinction.

I want to say another thing: I have observed that the majority of the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, who come here and urge the passage of these claims, are gentlemen who have private bills on the Calendar that they are personally interested in getting through; and that it is not because the bill is specially meritorious—it is not because they are inspired by patriotic sentiments or motives that they come here. I have observed over and over again that when a gentleman on the other side of the Chamber who has been very diligent in his attendance has succeeded at last in getting his bill through, we do not see that gentleman very often afterward at night sessions.

Now, I have said more than once that there were two or three classes of pension bills that I was opposed to; and this is one of them. The gentleman from New York seems to think that all of these are meritorious claims. I call his attention to the fact that a claim came before this body with a unanimous report from the committee which sent it here; and when it was discussed on this floor there were only five men who were willing to walk through the tellers and say that they were in favor of the passage of that claim. I want to say another thing, that the gentlemen who oppose these bills are not the only "obstructionists" on this floor. On a Friday night two or three weeks ago there was a bill before this House, the patron of which stated that he desired only a fair and square vote, and if he got that he would never raise the question of the absence of a quorum and that nobody on his side had ever done so. Here is his very language:

Mr. HULL. And there is business on this Calendar that I am anxious to get through; and I do not believe I am doing justice to my constituents in allowing it to be passed over night after night. The bill which I particularly refer to, I allowed to be passed over last Friday night because the point of "no quorum" was raised; but I am tired of permitting one or two men to determine what bills shall go through and what shall not.

Almost the language of my friend from New York. Then the gentleman from Iowa goes on further to say:

This Committee of the Whole ought to be able to determine what it will pass. If my bill were voted down in the Committee of the Whole, I would not raise the point of no quorum to save it. But it seems to me it is not fair toward those who have been attending practically every night session to have their bills passed over night after night because the gentleman from Virginia or some gentleman from some other State happens to object.

Again the same gentleman said in the course of that debate:

It has kept its place on the Calendar now for several nights, and I am unwilling to consent to any further delay. I do not think that we ought to consent to let bills which have merit in them be laid aside night after night simply because of the objection of one or two gentlemen. We have never raised the point of no quorum on this side, and it seems to me only justice to let the sense of the committee be taken upon the bill.

Within half an hour after the gentleman from Iowa had given utterance to those sentiments, declaring that he would not raise the question of no quorum if his bill was defeated, and had said that the point had never been made by his side, there was a vote by tellers, and his bill was squarely defeated by a majority of 6, whereupon he immediately rose in his seat and said that he would not allow his bill to be defeated at so slimly attended a session. When the bill obtained a majority vote a week before, and the question of no quorum was raised by myself or some one else, and the gentleman thought our conduct reprehensible, there were only about 52 members present and voting. But when the bill was beaten upon a square vote, he raised the question of no quorum, although there were 70 present!

And still gentlemen on this side are called "obstructionists." So long as you can railroad through a bill without a particle of merit, not supported by any legal testimony, it is all right even if there are only a dozen present; but the moment one of these bills is declared by this body to be without merit and is defeated, the very gentleman who has said that he would not raise the point of no quorum raises it.

Mr. WAUGH. Will the gentleman allow me a word of explanation? The point of no quorum as raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] was for the purpose of preventing a pension bill from being defeated, not for the purpose of preventing the consideration of a pension bill.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; exactly that.

Mr. WAUGH. Had Mr. HULL not raised the question of a quorum the bill would have been defeated. That action saved the bill for further consideration.

Mr. JONES. Of course——

Mr. WAUGH (continuing). And it did not defeat pension legislation, but saved it.

Mr. JONES. I understand exactly; that is the point I make. You seek to promote pension legislation by raising the point of no quorum. As long as you can add to the burdens of the taxpayers with only forty or fifty persons present and participating in pension legislation it is all right, but when those few can not be persuaded to favor a bill because of its utter lack of merit; because it is simply outrageous and indefensible, you think it all right to raise the quorum question. That is the gentleman's idea of promoting pension legislation.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Let me ask the gentleman if he has thought of the fact that perhaps not one-tenth of the bills that pass Congress receive the majority vote of a quorum of the House in a regular session?

Mr. JONES. I suppose that to be true if the gentleman includes those bills which are taken up in the morning hour by unanimous consent. The most of those, however, have probably been acted upon in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EVERETT. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Not one-tenth of the bills passed receive a majority of the votes of the House, counting a quorum present.

Mr. JONES. In reply to that, I wish to say that when a gentleman secures recognition on the floor to ask unanimous consent to pass a bill that has been favorably reported by a committee or otherwise he has to go to the Speaker of the House and get his consent to receive recognition, and the Speaker must know the character of the bill before he will recognize the gentleman to ask such consent.

But here there is nothing of that sort. We call the Calendar right along, and when there is a bill which it is supposed will elicit discussion and opposition, it is asked to be passed by, retaining its place on the Calendar; and even this bill would have been passed over if the request of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions had not been objected to by the gentleman in charge of the bill, who desired that it should be brought before the House, and in consequence of his action that we have been placed in this predicament.

Mr. LOUD. I am perfectly willing and have been all the time to have a vote on the bill on its merits, without all of this talk.

Mr. JONES. I was simply desirous of replying to the gentleman from New York and the strictures he has made on certain members on this side of the House. I wish to say that I, for one, if I am one of those persons alluded to by him, am perfectly willing to take my full share of the responsibility for the defeat of these bills. Moreover, I have never opposed a bill without carefully examining it, so far as the report would allow me to do so, and I am willing that my action shall be judged by the country. The reports will show in every case I have opposed that it had no merit. I am willing that my conduct shall be judged by those ex parte reports.

I want to say further, that a few nights ago, when I opposed the removal of the charge of desertion from a man who in my judgment was not entitled to such consideration, I was called out into the corridor after concluding my remarks, and a number of wounded Union soldiers, men whom I had never seen before, said to me that they merely sent for me to thank me for the stand I had taken against that class of pension legislation. One of them said that my course was approved by nine-tenths of the honest Union soldiers.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. You have taken considerable time in telling the House that there has been one objection on the other side by a gentleman who is now absent, and who can not reply, to the consideration of a bill by insisting upon a quorum. Have you also looked up the record of how many objections have been raised on that side to defeat all such legislation?

Mr. JONES. I have not; but a great many more than one, I will say to the gentleman.

I read from the RECORD simply because the gentleman from Iowa, in stating that he would not raise the question of a quorum, referred to the fact that I had done so repeatedly, and that he did not propose to act as I had done. Yet when his bill was defeated he turned right around and raised that question, and said that he would not allow his bill to be defeated by such a slim House. I gave you his exact language.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And I presume the gentleman from Iowa will make a proper answer when he returns to the city. But the point I wish to emphasize to the gentleman from Virginia is simply this: That where he found in a year's session one Republican who had made the point of no quorum for the purpose of preventing the defeat of what he believed to be proper legislation, the gentleman from Virginia and those who have been acting with him did make the point of no quorum, either by himself or his associates, not in one single case only, but in many cases, showing that the purpose was one of obstruction.

Mr. JONES. I will tell the gentleman why we so often raise the point of no quorum. Because usually the majority of those present at these night sessions are interested in claims of this character, and they vote for the claim of everybody else, no matter how unmeritorious, in order to secure votes for their own. That is why we are obliged to insist upon the presence of a quorum. That is why we have to resort to these proceedings. The gentlemen who come here are generally interested in bills. I say to the gentlemen, moreover, that I have heard dozens of gentlemen upon this floor say that the only reason they did not object to bad bills was because the objection would be made to their bills, and I have had numbers of gentlemen come to me and ask me to object to the passage of a bill which they believed was without merit, simply because they could not afford to do it, since they had bills upon the Private Calendar, and they could not afford to incite opposition to themselves.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I am very glad the gentleman has made that statement, because by making the statement he has contradicted the statement which he made a little while before, that he did not stand here to represent other men and the members of the Democratic party; but now he has proved conclusively by his own language, and by the assertions he has made in regard to the requests that he said were made to him, that he does stand for the Democratic party.

Mr. JONES. I deny that statement. I said that I had been repeatedly requested to oppose bad bills. I have never yet said that I made an objection at the suggestion of any human being, and I deny the gentleman's statement. I act on my individual judgment in every case.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Who are the men who have come to you and asked you to make objection?

Mr. JONES. Union soldiers have come to me, men who shed their blood on the battlefield have come to me and asked me to oppose bills that they regarded as bad.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish to ask the Chair if this bill has not been discussed for two hours and if that is not the end of it, except to vote on it?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not seem to be the end of it, but the gentleman is correct in the statement that it has been discussed for two hours.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I insist on the regular order, then.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that debate be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] asks unanimous consent that debate on this bill be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 40.

Accordingly, the motion of Mr. JONES was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] to lay aside the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 4.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina and Mr. LOUD.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 1.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of no quorum insisted upon?

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. LOUD. Out of deference to gentlemen who have bills to pass, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill and that it retain its place upon the Calendar.

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the call of the roll be dispensed with, and that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] asks unanimous consent that the call of the roll be dispensed with, and that the committee do now rise. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I object to that. I raise the point of order that that motion is out of order. I have made the point of no quorum, and have not withdrawn it, and I insist that that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. But this is a request for unanimous consent that the call of the roll be dispensed with, and that the committee rise. It can be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina objects. The Clerk will call the roll.

The names of the absentees will be entered upon the Journal. Sixty-eight gentlemen have answered present—not a quorum.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be excused, on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would also state that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CONN] is sick, and will be excused if there be no objection.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

YUMA INDIAN LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1919) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Yuma Indians in California, for the cession of their surplus lands, and for other purposes.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were, on page 3, to strike out section 5 and insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to dispose, within a reasonable time, of the tract of land provided for in article 7 of the agreement, including the buildings thereon, being the tract of land known as Fort Yuma, together with sufficient land lying to the eastward of said tract, to make one-half section of land, or 320 acres, to be used as a school farm and for educational, religious, and hospital purposes for said Yuma Indians, upon such terms as to him shall seem best for the care, education, and training of said Indians.

In section 7 to strike out from the word "tribe," in line 4, to the word "shall," in line 5, and from the word "granted," in line 5, to the word "water," in line 6, and add at the end of the section, "during the period of ten years, to be computed from the date when said irrigation company begins the delivery of water on said reservation;" so as to make the section read:

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to, from time to time, fix the rate of water rents to be paid by the said Indians, and that each male adult Indian of the Yuma tribe shall be granted water for 1 acre of the land which shall be allotted to him, if he utilizes the same in growing crops, free of all rent charges during the period of ten years, to be computed from the date when said irrigation company begins the delivery of water on said reservation."

And at the end of the bill to add the following proviso:

"Provided, That any Indians of the United States to whom land has been allotted shall be authorized to lease their lands for a period not exceeding five years, when deemed to their interest by the Secretary of the Interior, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary shall prescribe."

Mr. ROACH. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Provided, That the channel span of said bridge shall be in length not less than 350 feet in the clear, and shall be elevated at least 54 feet above the surface of the river at poolfull.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, yesterday morning I returned to this city from a three days' absence to the seacoast, where I had been in company with my colleague in the House, the Hon. W. A. MCKEIGHAN, and my secretary, for a few hours of necessary rest from hard work, and discovered that during my absence a report had been sent out in the papers that on Tuesday I was under the influence of intoxicating liquors and indecorous in my conduct.

I did not read the report, nor did I know of its existence until I discovered it on my return to this city. I went to the seacoast for the purpose of taking a few hours of necessary rest, and to recuperate from the effects of the protracted summer session. I did not leave the city at a time when my presence was needed, nor have I been absent an hour for seven months, and my usually vigorous constitution was becoming somewhat impaired by close confinement to labor. I did not announce my intended absence, because I desired to be free from annoyances that would be apt to follow a public departure into a section of the country I had never before visited, and where a Populist might be looked upon with some degree of curiosity.

This report was put out in so many different forms that I will not encumber the RECORD by reading it. Personally I am indifferent to it, for my short experience in public life has led me to believe that it is the policy of a portion of the press to misrepresent Senators and Representatives in Congress whose views they do not approve. It is due, however, to the Commonwealth which I have the honor to represent in part in this Chamber, and whose interests and honor are very sacred to me, that I should make this statement. If it concerned me alone and did not involve the interests and feelings of others, I should say nothing.

The great political party of which I am a member will not suffer in consequence of this assault on me, nor will I suffer from it; for its falsity will be understood by my friends, and as for my enemies, I am not concerned. I have not the power to chase down every idle rumor or false statement that can be set afloat and that travels with the rapidity of thought, to be followed by the truth at a snail's pace.

This is the first, and it is altogether likely to be the last, personal statement I will ever make in this Chamber, not because false reports may not be set afloat about me in the future, but because my friends will understand their falsity without any contradiction by me. It has not been concealed from me for many months that certain representatives of the press intended to misrepresent me and my position, and in one instance I have been given to understand very frankly that the reporter was carrying out strictly the wishes of his paper.

If any man has the curiosity to know what I have been doing during my term of service in this body, he may turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the past year and examine the bills and resolutions I have introduced, some of which I have succeeded in having become laws. If he desires to know whether I am attending to my business as a representative of a great State ought to do, he will find me either in the Senate during its sessions or at some committee room engaged in necessary labor. I devote my time, with slight interruptions, to hard work.

At the precise time this charge is said to have existed I was in my committee room in consultation with my colleague in the House, Mr. McKEIGHAN, and my secretary, Mr. Memminger, preparing a letter to be addressed to the Populist party in Nebraska by my Populist colleagues of the House and myself.

Mr. President, between legitimate journalism, which I regard as a very exalted occupation and with which I have some practical acquaintance, and that kind of jackal journalism that deals in falsehoods and fallacious stories for the purpose of injuring men and measures and for the edification of idle and careless readers and scandal mongers, I recognize a very great and marked distinction.

Among the young men in these galleries who report the discussions of this body from day to day there is not one for whom I do not entertain a kindly feeling, although their ideas and mine differ very widely on different questions; and they send out frequently to the world reports that are inexact, due in some measure, perhaps, to the hurry incident to the business, and that are positively injurious and misleading.

No man 500 miles from Washington can, in my judgment, by reading the newspapers, obtain a strictly accurate account of what transpires in Congress. The only place where such a report can be found is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

This report would have it understood by the public that there is personal ill-will existing between the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and myself, and I desire to stamp that statement as false so far as I am concerned, and add that while that Senator and myself, as well as other Senators, have had some very spirited and animated discussions over matters pending in this Chamber where we did not agree, such debates have never left rankling in my breast the slightest personal ill-feeling for that gentleman or any other. And, expressing my views once for all with respect to this matter, I desire to say that no controversy or debate, however plain it may be, ever leaves in my breast feelings of ill-will toward the man who may antagonize my position.

I am given myself to plain talking. My language is not courtly or indirect. I call things by their right names as nearly as I understand them, and I like to see others pursue the same course; but I have never at any time attempted to use any political maneuvering or to finesse or place anyone in a false light or position, notwithstanding I have on more than one occasion been the intended victim of such attempts.

Mr. President, I wish to emphasize as strongly as it is possible for me to do, that reports that there is anything like ill feeling on my part toward any individual Senator are absolutely without foundation, and in the interest of truth they ought not to be made. I desire to emphasize the fact that while I do not court abuse, either personal or political, I believe there is an organized attempt to have misleading and untruthful reports sent out to the country about Senators and Representatives who are known as Populists, in the hope that under the lash of the press they can be restrained from doing their duty toward the country as they understand it. I prefer abuse and misrepresentation under such circumstances to desertion of duty. I believe, Mr. President, in that kind of warfare that is good natured, gentlemanly, and courteous, and which emanates from the brain and not from vicious motives.

Mr. President, I shall discharge my duties in this Chamber to the best of my ability as long as I remain here. I will not suffer any false reports or the fear of such reports to drive me from the plain path of duty. While I appreciate as highly as any man can that it is pleasing to have the friendship of all persons, yet if I am ever put to the test of choosing between my own self-respect and the respect of the public I shall not hesitate to choose the former.

I do not speak with any ill-feeling toward the particular author or authors of this report, and would not do them any injustice by word or deed.

I do not speak in anger, but I can not resist the temptation of saying that the individual, human only in semblance, who will assail and blacken character, reeking in slander and mendacity as a bug reeks in filth, and who hides himself in obscurity behind the strong protection of a powerful public press, is, in my judgment, a most deadly enemy to society. As compared to such a creature, if they could walk erect, the hyena and the graveyard ghoul would be gentlemen. He is only surpassed in natural depravity, sharpened and quickened by practice, by that other despicable creature who may inspire him, and who, like the Indian strangler, following the natural instincts of total cowardice, crouches and crawls in the grass, and, taking no risk of danger to himself, throws his well-aimed and deadly cord around his victim's neck and destroys a precious human life.

INVESTIGATIONS BY COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yesterday the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] offered a resolution relating to the Lower Brule Indians. I move to strike out all after the word "Resolved," in that resolution, and insert as a substitute what I send to the desk; and I ask that the resolution lie over until both the Senator from South Dakota and I can be in the Senate. I understand the Senator from South Dakota will not be here to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert:

That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed, either by full committee or such subcommittee or committees as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, with the full power of such committee to continue during the recess of Congress the investigations authorized by the resolutions of May 13, 1890, and February 27, 1891, with the authority and in the manner and to the extent provided in said resolutions, and in pursuance of such investigations to visit the several Indian reservations, Indian schools supported in whole or in part by the Government, and the five nations in the Indian Territory, or any reservation where, in the opinion of said committee, it may be necessary to extend their investigations.

Second. That said committee or subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to examine witnesses under oath touching the matters which they are hereby empowered to investigate, and may hold their sessions during the recess of the Senate at such place or places as they may determine; and the necessary and proper expense incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6080) granting a certain military reservation to Oklahoma City, Okla., to aid the public free schools thereof, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McRAE, Mr. HARE, and Mr. MOON, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate authorizing the Committees on Enrolled Bills of the Senate and House of Representatives to make a correction in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

GRANT OF MILITARY RESERVATION TO OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6080) granting a certain military reservation to Oklahoma City, Okla., to aid the public free schools thereof, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference thereon.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MARTIN, Mr. McLAURIN, and Mr. PETTIGREW were appointed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF HENRY H. SIBLEY.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senate to consider at this time the bill (S. 914) for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry H. Sibley, deceased.

Mr. PLATT. That bill will take hours in its discussion.

Mr. DANIEL. Then it might as well take them now as at any other time, if we can get the bill up. It has passed the Senate once before, and probably the Senator may have voted for it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know whether I did or not.

Mr. DANIEL. It lies in a very brief compass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Virginia will yield until I can have the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill taken up and passed. As soon as we get the appropriation bills in conference there will be ample time to take up other bills, whether they lead to discussion or not, and ample time to dispose of them when taken up.

Mr. DANIEL. I see, with the brief time remaining of the morning hour, I could hardly expect the attention to this bill which it deserves if there is any controversy about it. This is the second time this session I have tried to get the bill up.

I will yield to the request of the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, as I think the bill he has in charge should be disposed of.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he will give way to allow a bill of only one page which I have in charge to be considered and passed?

Mr. COCKRELL. That may be done after a while. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] gave notice yesterday that he intended to submit some remarks this morning on the legislative bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7097) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was a question yesterday evening about the clerks of courts provided for on page 122. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and I ask the Secretary to read the amendment adopted on page 122, line 23.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "hire," in line 23, on page 122, insert:

And their compensation as provided by law under sections 2 and 9 of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing the circuit courts of appeal, and not exceeding $500.

Mr. ALLISON. The word "law" should be stricken out. It should read, "as provided by section 9 of the act of March 3, 1891," etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the word "law" be stricken out and also the word "two" after the word section. Now, let the amendment be read as it is proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as proposed to be amended will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 122, line 23, after the word "hire," it is proposed to insert:

And their compensation as provided by section 9 of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing the circuit courts of appeals, and not exceeding $500.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the consent of the chairman of the committee to offer what I send to the desk, to come in as an amendment on page 123, after line 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 123, after line 11, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the judge of the district court for the northern district of Illinois shall be authorized to appoint a clerk of such court at a salary of $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment which was reserved yesterday, beginning at line 12, on page 25, and extending to line 23, on page 26, will be stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri, in order to save time, whether the question had not better be first taken on striking out the last sections of the bill, because, if they are stricken out, the amendments in the earlier portions of the bill fall.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them all be considered at once.

Mr. SHERMAN. I intend to address myself entirely to the eight or ten sections at the end of the bill. If those sections are retained in the bill, as a matter of course, the other amendments provided for in the earlier parts should be retained.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well. Then let the sections in the latter part of the bill be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the Secretary read, beginning with section 3, on page 126, to the end of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The reading of the bill was resumed at section 3, on page 126.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 126, line 25, after the word "Auditors," to insert:

And each deputy auditor, in addition to the duties now required to be performed by him, shall sign, in the name of the Auditor, such letters and papers as the Auditor may direct.

So as to make the clause read:

SEC. 3. The Auditors of the Treasury shall hereafter be designated as follows: The First Auditor as Auditor for the Treasury Department; the Second Auditor as Auditor for the War Department; the Third Auditor as Auditor for the Interior Department; the Fourth Auditor as Auditor for the Navy Department; the Fifth Auditor as Auditor for the State and other Departments; the Sixth Auditor as Auditor for the Post-Office Department. The designations of the deputy auditors and other subordinates shall correspond with those of the Auditor. And each deputy auditor, in addition to the duties now required to be performed by him, shall sign, in the name of the Auditor, such letters and papers as the Auditor may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 21, on page 141.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 141, line 18, I move to strike out "July" and insert "October."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 142, line 18, after the words "day of," to strike out "July" and insert "October;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 24. The provisions of sections 3 to 23 inclusive of this act shall be in force on and after the 1st day of October, 1894.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 142, line 23, before the word "persons," to insert "two," and on page 143, line 3, after the word "Congress," to insert, "notwithstanding section 1765 of the Revised Statutes, or section 3 of the act of June 29, 1874, chapter 328, or of any other provisions of this act;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 26. The joint commission of Congress, appointed under the act approved March 3, 1893, is authorized to pay to the two persons designated by, and on the joint approval of, the chairman of said commission, for clerical services not exceeding $2,500 per annum from March 3, 1893, until the conclusion of the Fifty-third Congress, notwithstanding section 1765 of the Revised Statutes, or section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, chapter 328, or of any other provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out all of the sections relating to this matter, commencing with section 3, on page 126, to the end of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of the bill, commencing with section 3, on page 126, to the end of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is a sad commentary upon American legislation that a proposition which thoroughly changes and revolutionizes the accounting of the Treasury Department, and therefore the accounting of the whole Government of the United States, is now to be suddenly enacted into law, not by the act of either House, but by the attachment to the pending bill of provisions which could not have been, and are not now, well understood in either House. These provisions, as I say, create an entire revolution in our financial system, and yet probably not twenty Senators will know that this question is pending or care what disposition is made of it.

The proposition is here in violation of the rules of both the House and the Senate. If this proposition were offered to-day as an amendment in the Senate it would be ruled out at once by our rules as containing legislation, and the same would be true in the House of Representatives, if objection were made there to the introduction of this subject-matter.

Yet I consider it my duty, without much hope of success however, to place upon the record of the Senate what, in my judgment, will be the consequences of this change in our financial system. I wish first to call attention to the elemental principles of our financial management. I find that all the laws I will need to read are old and well-established, commencing with the very foundation of the Government.

Section 233 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

There shall be at the seat of Government an Executive Department to be known as the Department of the Treasury, and a Secretary of the Treasury, who shall be the head thereof.

Section 236 provides that—

All claims and demands whatever by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or as creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the Department of the Treasury.

I find also this provision, which is in the act of the 2d of September, 1789, the famous act framed by Hamilton:

There shall be in the Department of the Treasury a First Comptroller and a Second Comptroller, each of whom shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to a salary of $5,000 a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. Did I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that that is the act of September 2, 1789?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is so stated here in the marginal notes.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is simply a mistake. When the Treasury Department was organized there was an Auditor, a Comptroller, a Treasurer, and a Register only.

Mr. SHERMAN. The office of First Comptroller was undoubtedly provided for in the act of the 2d of September, 1789.

Now, the next section specifies the duties of the Comptroller. There was but one Comptroller in the beginning. Now there are three.

Mr. COCKRELL. Two.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the Commissioner of Customs a Comptroller. He has always been regarded as a Comptroller, and is one.

I wish to read now the duties of the Comptroller as established in these early times:

It shall be the duty of the First Comptroller:

First. To examine all accounts settled by the First Auditor, except those relating to receipts from customs, and all accounts settled by the Fifth Auditor, and by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to certify the balances arising thereon to the Register.

In the original act, as a matter of course, these duties were confined to one Comptroller and the other Comptrollers were added to it at a later period. I may mention that hereafter.

Second. To superintend the adjustment and preservation of the public accounts subject to his revision.
Third. To countersign all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, which shall be warranted by law.
Fourth. To superintend the recovery of all debts certified by him to be due to the United States, and for that purpose to direct all such suits and legal proceedings, and to take such measures as may be authorized by law, and are adapted to enforce prompt payment thereof.

Those are the broad, comprehensive duties of the Comptroller, and they stand and have stood as the law since the 2d of September, 1789, although in that period of time, by the acts of 1817 and 1849, two Comptrollers were added to the number. Their powers were not changed, however.

In defining the duties of the Second Comptroller, the act of the 3d of March, 1817, provides that—

It shall be the duty of the Second Comptroller:
First. To examine all accounts settled by the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditors, and certify the balances arising thereon to the Secretary of the Department in which the expenditure has been incurred.
Second. To countersign all warrants drawn by the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, which shall be warranted by law. [See § 3673.]
Third. To report to the Secretaries of War and of the Navy the official forms to be issued in the different offices for disbursing the public money in those Departments, and the manner and form of keeping and stating the accounts of the persons employed therein.
Fourth. To superintend the preservation of the public accounts subject to his revision.

Similar powers were conferred upon an officer called the Commissioner of Customs, and which related only to the collection of revenue and the disbursement of the expenses of the collection of the revenue. The Auditors were provided for at the same time and by the same law. I think there was but one in the beginning, and there are now six. Section 276 provides that—

There shall be connected with the Department of the Treasury six auditors of accounts, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be known as the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Auditors, respectively. * * *
SEC. 277. The duties of the Auditors shall be as follows:
First. The First Auditor shall receive and examine all accounts accruing in the Treasury Department, all accounts relating to the receipts from customs, including accounts of collectors and other officers of the customs, all accounts accruing on account of salaries in the Patent Office—

Then it defines a great number of accounts—and, after examination—

Here is the point I want to come to—and, after examination of such accounts relating to the receipts from customs, including the accounts of collectors and other officers of the customs, he shall certify the balances and transmit the same, with the vouchers and certificates, to the Commissioner of Customs for his decision thereon, and he shall certify the balances of all other accounts, and transmit the same, in like manner, to the First Comptroller for his decision thereon.

These are the fundamental laws which provide for the mode of accounting in the Treasury Department. There are two sets of officers. Every account or claim made against the Government of the United States until this hour has to pass under the supervision of one Auditor and one Comptroller, the Comptroller being the judge not only as to the legality of the claim against the United States, but as to the amount due. That has been the law ever since the foundation of the Government and in the Revolutionary period for ten years before the Government was founded.

Now, it is proposed by this bill to abolish all the Comptrollers in the Treasury except one. I will read the first clause of section 4, of the bill:

The offices of Commissioner of Customs, Deputy Commissioner of Customs, Second Comptroller, Deputy Second Comptroller, and Deputy First Comptroller of the Treasury are abolished, and the First Comptroller of the Treasury shall hereafter be known as Comptroller of the Treasury.

It goes on and provides for his duties, excluding him from any participation in accounting, except in case of an appeal. Then it transfers to the Auditors, who are divided among the different Departments, as I shall show, all the powers of the Comptroller in addition to the powers they now exercise by the law.

Heretofore all claims and as well the accounts of disbursing officers go to the Auditor. He examines the amount, the statement of the case, and presents it. According to the natural idea of an auditor, an examiner, he is a man who states the case or makes out the figure. It is then sent to the Comptroller, and is there passed upon finally. But this proposed act takes away entirely from the Comptroller all power in the case except in the case of a limited appeal, which I shall refer to hereafter, and confines the examination of the accounts to a single officer; and that is a revolutionary proceeding in my judgment.

Now, let us reflect on this proposed change for a moment. Any kind of a claim may be made to the Auditor. It may be well or ill founded. It may be fraudulent or fair. It goes into the hands first of the Auditor, then to some clerk, and finally probably reaches down to a second or third class clerk. The gravest claims against the Government and claims for the Government are proposed to be referred to these officers, without any supervision whatever, except that supervision or possible supervision which I shall mention hereafter; and if the account is certified by the Auditor, without the aid of the Comptroller, it is then certified—where?

First, The Auditor for the Treasury Department shall receive and examine all accounts of salaries and incidental expenses of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and all bureaus and offices under his direction, all accounts relating to the customs service, public debt, internal revenue, Treasurer and assistant treasurers, mints and assay offices, Bureau of Engraving and Printing—and to all other business within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Treasury, and certify the balances arising thereon to the division of bookkeeping and warrants.

Now, what is that division? It is under one of the clerks of the Secretary of the Treasury, appointed by him, controlled by him, and removable at his pleasure. He is an officer at the head of a division. It is called a division in the Secretary's office. His functions heretofore have been to make out statements, estimates for appropriations, expenses, and the like. It is a very important position, it is true, but a position having no responsibility in connection with the collection of debts or the payment of claims.

The balances are certified to him for what? For a warrant upon the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury has no more power over this matter than you, sir, as President of the Senate. He has no power whatever. It was intended by our financial law that while the Secretary is the head of the Department and may control the movements of others and direct their conduct so far as he lawfully can, yet he has neither the power to receive money nor to pay money. The Secretary of the Treasury would be the last man to get any money out of the Treasury of the United States. He could not by any possibility touch or handle money, because it is left entirely to the accounting officers, and those accounting officers are independent men. They are leading men in the country.

The Comptrollers who have filled that great office since the foundation of the Government have been equal in ability and power to and better lawyers than the great body of the Secretaries of the Treasury who have held office there. I refer to such men as Whittlesey, who is known to you, sir, by reputation; such men as Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Tayler, men of the highest ability, who have held that position.

Mr. CULLOM. And Mr. Matthews.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Matthews was a very good officer, but not equal to some others. Mr. Whittlesey was understood to be the one of chief merit, and Mr. Whittlesey upheld his position openly, I think, if I am not mistaken, to Mr. Jefferson Davis, at any rate to some prominent Cabinet officer. He overruled the requisition of the Secretary of War. Complaint was made, and Mr. Whittlesey said that was within his function, and it was beyond the power of the Secretary of War or anybody else.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I hardly feel satisfied with the remark he made to the effect that the gentleman to whom I referred was not equal to some of the others.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know him so well.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought so. That gentleman was for a long time a circuit judge in our State. He is a very able lawyer, and he would probably have been a candidate for supreme judge this year if he had consented to accept the nomination.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the gentleman deserves all the Senator says of him. I happen to know the others from the olden times, especially Mr. Whittlesey, who was one of the greatest men this country produced. He was a long time a member of the House of Representatives, and was then transferred to this position, which he held through several Administrations under different parties.

Now, as to the question of transferring the whole accountability of the Treasury Department from two men who are constantly looking out for each other to a single division or to a clerk in a division in the Secretary's office, it seems to me it is one of those things that when proposed should be rejected from the beginning. The mere question of a slight saving of expense (although I do not think there will be any) or the mere question of convenience ought not to be considered for a moment.

There have been some objections urged, I feel bound to state, that the position taken by the Commission appointed by Congress to examine into this matter has been well sustained by able arguments from the members of the Commission, and especially from their experts, but it seems to me that every one of the points made by those gentlemen could be easily answered. In the first place, the experts upon whom our friends have relied are, I understand, railroad men, accustomed no doubt to large transactions in dealing with railroad accounts. They are not men familiar with the Treasury of the United States. They are not men who have ever held positions there. They are not men familiar with the peculiar organization of that most complicated machinery, the Treasury Department. They look at it simply as they would look upon the accounts of a corporation, but it is far beyond that.

Therefore, when it is said that a single individual might be trusted to pass upon the accounts of a corporation it does not follow that greater care should not be taken when we are dealing with the great affairs of the Government, with a revenue of $400,000,000. Sir, the vast machinery that we have under control, the collection and disbursement of more than $400,000,000, is one of those huge things that require all the care, all the guards that can surround it. To compare it with a railroad corporation, however great may be its transactions, or to suppose that the same machinery necessary to protect a lot of stockholders should be applied to the machinery of the United States is very faulty.

The idea, therefore, of breaking down a single one of the barriers which guard and protect the property of the United States ought to be considered with the gravest care. So happy and so successful have been the financial operations of the Government of the United States that from the beginning until this time there has been very little loss. So far as I know now, no loss worth naming has been caused by the neglect of the officers of the Government, either Auditors or Comptrollers. This is owing to the very fact that these duties are divided and one is under the watch and eye of the other, and that any error or mistake made in the Auditor's Office when sent to the Comptroller would be there corrected by a different set of clerks, with whom they have no communication and of whose acts they could have no knowledge.

Therefore it is that scarcely any losses have occurred. Hardly one mill in a million has been lost through any want of honesty among the officers of the Government or any defects in the machinery of the Government. So when it is proposed to change all this, having been compelled at one time to assume important duties in that Department, I feel that any change whatever proposed to be made in existing conditions except to strengthen them ought to be met with prompt and determined resistance.

I can conceive the force, I admit, of some of the points made by Senators who have had this matter in charge. I believe that there ought to be but one Comptroller, and that he ought to have under him three or four very able men who are assistants with a large and liberal pay—men of high character, great lawyers. These Comptrollers have to pass upon questions of law, sometimes extremely difficult. I can say that the duties of a Comptroller if properly performed are equally as important as the duties of the Chief Justice of the United States.

Mr. PLATT. Or the Attorney-General.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are more important. We could get along very well with a comparatively weak Attorney-General, but we could not get along well with an imcompetent Comptroller of the Treasury. But if you take from him all the essential powers of his office and the power to supervise the Auditor, so that the statements of the Auditors are to be taken as true and valid without further examination, there is the end. All that the Comptroller could then do would be to pass upon such legal questions as are brought before him, but now he not only passes upon legal questions but he supervises through his agents and employés all the matters of account. Every addition is made in that office, and it is a check upon the other office.

Mr. President, the nature and character of the questions which are brought before this officer I think make him far more important than the Secretary of the Treasury. The office of Secretary of the Treasury will almost run itself, because there is an experienced body of men in the clerical force around him. His signature is all that is wanted generally in the great variety of business there, but the Comptroller has mental work to perform every day. He has the combined duty of an arithmetician and a judge. He passes upon legal principles and upon sums of arithmetic.

Therefore, I say it is a grave mistake for the Government of the United States to change the system without fuller deliberation than has been had. Think of it now. This proposition here has never been read in the Senate until to-day. It was never read in the Senate until it was offered and put on the bill nem. con. in order to get rid of it. It is here in violation of our rules. I will state what I think our friends ought to do on both sides of the Chamber, because there has been no party feeling in this matter, as is shown by the debate that has taken place in the other House and the various speeches made there. I have read myself, among the rest, one from a member from Missouri, another from a member from Maine. Then there were others on the other side of the question. All have been temperate and kindly. There is no necessity to hurry this matter. Besides, if the law is enacted it can not go into effect immediately. I have a letter here from a leading officer of the Treasury Department saying that it would require at least a year to make the necessary preparations and set the system in motion exactly. New sets of forms and new modes of accounts will be necessary.

There is another feature of the provision that I dislike very much, and that is that they have designated the Auditors according to the Department whose accounts they are to act upon. That is, the accounts from the War Department go to the Auditor for the War Department; and for every other Department there is an Auditor, except the State Department. A number of other divisions and employments are grouped together, but as a rule there is an Auditor for the War Department, an Auditor for the Interior Department, and so on.

It was the intention of the framework of the Departments that the heads of Departments should have no power or control over the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department at least was to be absolutely independent. I think it is a very faulty division of the powers and distributions of the various Auditors to say that one is for the Army and one is for the Navy. How long will it be before the Army Auditor will feel that he belongs to the Army and feel disposed to be generous and liberal to the men of the Army? The Auditors then, instead of being servants of the Treasury Department, will become the servants of the heads of the different Departments after which they are named. That was the trouble with the Sixth Auditor. He was attached to the Post-Office Department, and he came to believe that he was independent of the Treasury Department. Finally he was curtly informed that he was still an officer of the Treasury Department. Even now the tendency is to transfer the whole accounting of the Post-Office Department, amounting to seventy odd million dollars a year, to the Postmaster-General.

These Departments naturally try to build themselves up one upon the ground of another. Therefore nearly all of them have established around the head of the Department what is called an administrative cabinet. That is the tendency, and that tendency ought to be broken up. The old practice was by law to distribute the various kinds of accounts among the different officers, and the Third, Fourth, and Fifth Auditors had to pass upon accounts that belong to different Departments, so that there could be no favoritism, no power to influence the Auditor; but if you place an auditor in charge of a particular class of accounts, say naval accounts, he will soon become attached to the Navy. The natural effect of association in passing upon such accounts would have its influence with him, especially when his accounts are not to be passed upon by any other officer. A double examination in the accounts of the Treasury Department is essential, and without it no provision ought to be made.

As I said, I would be in favor of having only one Comptroller, but I would give him strong assistance, so that he might pass the second time upon all the accounts that go through the different Auditors. I would so divide up these accounts that no one could tell exactly what account would come to him. I suppose it would be within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to do that. But now it is proposed to be defined by law so that it can not be changed.

I have here now some impartial reports that were made by men not in office or not seeking office. I have three or four letters or statements made by gentlemen who in the past were leading officers of the Treasury Department. Some of them live here now, but they have not been in the Treasury Department for some years. I have no doubt most of the Senators have had their attention called to the statement of Mr. J. R. Garrison, late Deputy First Comptroller of the Treasury. He was a very worthy, excellent officer, as I have always understood. He was for a long time in office in the Treasury Department, and went gradually up until he became one of the leading officers there. He says:

The bills above referred to—

Speaking of the bills which were then pending—

provide for abolishing the office of Second Comptroller of the Treasury, for taking away from the First Comptroller his power and authority to make detailed examination and final settlement of accounts and claims in his office. Six auditors provided for are invested with exclusive power and authority to finally examine and certify all accounts and claims in which the United States are concerned, subject to appeal, under conditions specified, to the First Comptroller, who is to be known as the Comptroller of the Treasury. Accounts are no longer to be certified to the Register of the Treasury, but to a division in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be known as the division of bookkeeping and warrants.

Another feature of this proposition is, that when the accounts are passed by the Auditor he still retains possession of them and they are in his custody, while under existing law they are transferred to the Register; the idea being that the Auditor should examine and pass the accounts, and they would go to the Comptroller, and then in due course they would come back to the Register, where they would be registered and account kept of them, and they would be cared for. But all that it is proposed to change. The Register's office is to be practically abolished, except so far as certain matters named in the bill.

The files of accounts are no longer to be kept by the Register (who has been the custodian of the accounts of civil expenditures since the foundation of the Government), but the respective Auditors are to keep the files of the accounts subject to their jurisdiction.

The respective jurisdiction of the six Auditors of the Treasury (excepting that of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department) is very materially modified.

In order to clearly comprehend the effect and scope of the proposed legislation the two bills referred to must be considered in connection with Senate bill No. 1738 and House bill No. 5750, which are identical, both introduced March 6, 1894, and provide for abolishing the office of Commissioner of Customs and concentrating in the First Auditor the sole and final authority as to examining and certifying customs accounts and all other accounts subject to the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Customs, with the right of appeal to the First Comptroller under specified conditions.

Right here it must be observed that this last-named bill, in section 3, provides that the First Auditor shall certify to the Register of the Treasury the accounts now subject, under existing law, to the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Customs, and this bill (H. R. 5750) was passed by the House March 8, 1894.

But by the bill introduced March 29, 1894—

A few days afterwards—

above referred to (Senate No. 1831, identical with H. R. No. 6478), in section 5, it is provided that the First Auditor shall have sole and final jurisdiction with respect to the same class of accounts—those now subject to the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Customs—but shall certify said accounts to the division of bookkeeping and warrants.

That is an office in the Secretary's office proper. He discusses one or two other points. It has been said that this will expedite business; that it will especially hasten forward action upon the cases of disbursing officers. Here is his reply to that:

How far will the proposed changes expedite the public business? The question has been considered as if the delays so much complained of occur only in the offices of the Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs, and it is assumed that if these offices are abolished all the public business will be kept up to date. Facts do not sustain any such line of argument. The delay in the Auditors' offices have been quite as much as those in the offices of the Comptrollers and Commissioner, in all probability more, except in isolated cases where the Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs have necessarily held up accounts and claims pending investigation of frauds or the production of necessary evidence. A full and fair investigation, not confined to a single Auditor or to any special class of accounts, will demonstrate the correctness of this statement.

Here is another point, the truth of which I know from my own personal observation and experience:

Again, nearly all accounts pass through some Executive Department for administrative action or approval, and it is just here that most delays occur. Well-authenticated cases might be cited in which the head of some Department has complained to the First Comptroller of the supposed delay of his office in passing some account or claim, when investigation has developed the fact that the very account was lying unacted upon in the Department from which complaint emanated.

That grew out of the practice I mentioned a while ago, that nearly all the heads of Departments gathered around themselves a little coterie, a little administrative cabinet. No doubt in all the Departments there are clerks of various kinds who form such a cabinet, and these accounts are especially those of disbursing officers of the Navy and the Army. They would be retained, and would receive a kind of a superficial examination. There is no legal authority for such an examination, and there is no legal authority for any examination of public claims or accounts, except those in the Treasury Department, to which I have referred.

I can not see any objection, however, to the head of the Department looking through the papers of any officer of his department, to ascertain whether the office is properly conducted.

I do not complain of it. I know myself when I was Secretary of the Treasury complaints were made about the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers, and it was finally found the accounts were left to the War or the Navy Department at the time, though the blame all fell upon the Treasury Department.

The paper I have here, which was prepared by Mr. Garrison, is a very interesting document. I shall not stop to read it, as I do not care to weary the Senate with reading, but I shall ask leave to print it in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I invite Senators who wish to look into this matter to read this paper, because it is certainly a very able one, and goes over the whole ground, giving the history of these offices; and Mr. Garrison is certainly a very well-informed man. I will read one paragraph from his paper:

Doubtless a bonded disbursing officer will, if honest, seek to render correct accounts and avoid errors for which he and his sureties must be held accountable. This may be said of any officer who renders accounts to the Government. If all disbursing officers were beyond the reach of temptation and strictly honest there might be some force in what is said regarding their primary examination to see that their own accounts are correct. But it must be remembered that some of the heaviest losses to the Government have been through the defalcations of some of its disbursing officers. A dishonest disbursing officer may succeed in corrupting a dishonest Auditor, in whom is concentrated the sole and exclusive authority as to settlement of accounts, as is given in the proposed modification and reform of the accounting system. But under the existing system, wherein every account settled by an Auditor must receive a detailed examination and revision by a Comptroller, such corruption or collusion is impossible, unless both officers can be corrupted. One operates as a check upon the other.

I have another paper here written by a gentleman who was a high officer in the office of the Second Comptroller, but who is not now connected with the office, and does not care to have his name drawn into the controversy. His statement in regard to this bill is brief, and I shall ask the liberty of inserting that also in the RECORD, so that the Senate may have full information on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator want those papers inserted in the body of his remarks or appended to them?

Mr. SHERMAN. They will be inserted in the body of my remarks in small type.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall ask that the report of the Joint Commission of Congress to Inquire into the Status of Laws Reorganizing the Executive Departments, and also the report of the experts, may be inserted. I should prefer, if papers presented by the Senator are published at the end of his remarks that these documents should follow that, as the reply of the experts is a refutation of the statements submitted by the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the papers being appended to my remarks.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I ask that the reports to which I have referred may be inserted after the papers submitted by the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have here a communication from W. I. Lewis, who was formerly a clerk in the Treasury Department. It so happens that of the gentlemen who have sent me communications, one was in the office of the Commissioner of Customs, one in the office of the First Comptroller, and one in the office of the Second Comptroller. As the letter of Mr. Lewis, who was formerly a clerk in the Treasury Department, but is now a business man in the city of Washington, is very brief, I shall append it to my remarks.

I have also a letter from Mr. Lawrence, which I shall read. Mr. Lawrence was certainly one of the most industrious Comptrollers we ever had in the Treasury Department. He wrote more opinions and made more decisions than I suppose any judge upon the bench ever did in the same length of time. His letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 20, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation last evening, I respectfully call your attention to volume 1 of the Decisions of the First Comptroller in the Department of the Treasury, in the appendix to which you will find the organization and duties of the accounting officers (pages 411-700) as they stood in 1880. Claims generally against the United States, except those paid by disbursing officers, are first presented by the claimant, or in some cases transmitted by the officers in the Departments to the proper Auditor, who states an account, either allowing or disallowing the claim, when it is passed to the proper Comptroller, who either rejects it or certifies a balance due the claimant.

If the case is a civil matter, the First Comptroller certifies it to the Register, who certifies a copy of the Comptroller's settlement to the Secretary of the Treasury for warrant. If it is a War, Navy, or Indian claim, the Second Comptroller certifies it to the head of the proper Department, who draws his requisition on the Secretary of the Treasury for payment, the requisition being countersigned by the Second Comptroller and registered by the Second, Third, or Fourth Auditor, according to the nature of the claim.

The Secretary issues a warrant on the Treasurer, which is countersigned by the First Comptroller, and is registered by the Register. The warrant is then transmitted to the Treasurer, who issues a draft on himself or either of the assistant treasurers, or a United States depositary. Warrants for the advance of money to disbursing officers must be signed by the Secretary himself, and countersigned by the First Comptroller. Other warrants are signed by an Assistant Secretary, and countersigned in the name of the First Comptroller by his deputy. Neither the Second Comptroller nor Commissioner of Customs, who is also a Comptroller, has any duty in connection with warrants. The accounts of disbursing officers are settled by the proper Auditors and Comptrollers.

The Sixth Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, who is his own comptroller, countersigns warrants issued by the Postmaster-General on accounts settled by him.

I am of opinion that in order to secure uniformity of decisions there should be but one Comptroller, with an increased salary, removable only by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The auditors should be retained by all means. A double scrutiny of claims is essential to secure accuracy and honesty.

Respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM LAWRENCE.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN.

That is the opinion of Mr. Lawrence, who is entirely disinterested.

I shall also ask leave to print a short statement in regard to the organization of the Treasury Department and mode of dealing with accounts from the beginning of the Government, which is very brief.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The paper referred to by the Senator from Ohio will be appended to his remarks, in the absence of objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have another paper here, which I shall not print but shall hand to the Senator from Missouri. It is upon the transfer of the files and records of the Treasury Department, and I think it will be interesting to the Senator, as it is connnected somewhat with this subject, but I do not think it necessary to print it.

Mr. President, I have said about all I desire to say. I have no feeling and no interest about this matter more than any other Senator. There is no officer in the Treasury in whose case I am at all interested. All I desire to do is to preserve intact all the securities which have been given to the Government of the United States to protect its Treasury from defalcation and fraud.

I think it is unquestionable that if we should take away the guards which are now around the Treasury Department, the power of the Comptroller to reëxamine the acts of the auditors in all their parts and details, a great blow will be given to our financial solvency and frauds will undoubtedly occur.

It is sometimes said, and has been said with a good deal of ingenuity by the gentlemen who support this proposition, that an appeal may be taken from the auditors to the comptrollers, but that is very fully answered in one of the statements I have submitted. Who makes the appeal? The claimant can make the appeal and the Secretary of the Treasury can make the appeal. But how can the Secretary of the Treasury know anything about what is going on in the accounting offices?

It would not be possible for the Secretary of the Treasury to know anything of one out of a thousand of the claims which are daily being acted upon in the Department. Who is to inform him? Who is to act for the Government? If there is any fraud committed by any officer of the Government, that officer is interested in concealing the fraud, and there would be no chance for the Secretary to know of it.

Besides, one year is allowed within which to make an appeal. Would you suspend all the payments of the Government for one year in order to allow somebody to make an appeal?

The whole provision, it seems to me, is not carefully drawn. The bill is of no account whatever; and it is merely put in for buncombe. I do not intimate that the Senators who have been engaged in this investigation would try to deceive anyone, for I know they do not so desire, and have no wish to conceal anything; but evidently this appeal to the Comptroller as to particular claims is entirely unfounded. It is true that there is not taken from him the power to pass upon legal questions. Where new laws have been enacted which have to be construed, the Auditor is bound to consult the Comptroller as to the proper construction of those laws, but when a legal question shall arise in the examination of a claim as a matter of course nobody would know anything about it except the clerk who has the management and the care of the account. So there is no guard whatever. The Comptroller may be ever so able a man, but he may have no opportunity to act in such a case.

So far as the Secretary of the Treasury is concerned, it is impossible for him to know what is going on in that great Department. He never looks after claims, and the law expressly excludes him from having anything to do with claims. A Secretary of the Treasury would not dare, consistently with his public duty, even to mention the subject of a claim to an Auditor or a Comptroller. If he should do so he would show his utter unfitness for the office. No man who ever held that office would ever do a thing of that kind. It would be in the nature of a criminal act for him to attempt to influence his subordinates. The accounting officers are absolutely independent of him, and he can not interfere with them.

So that in every way I can look at it, I regard this measure as a bad measure, although no doubt it is regarded in a different light by the commission who were ordered to examine into the matter, and who prepared it.

But it seems to me now—and I make this criticism with some reluctance—that this commission ought to have reported their proceedings to each House, and that report should have been sent either to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Finance, where it should have been taken up and a proper inquiry and examination made. A joint commission has no right to report in this way. All it can do is to inform Congress, and then its report should be sent to one of the regular committees.

I say to my honorable friend from Missouri—and no man respects him more than I do, not only as a faithful, honest, and industrious public servant, but as a man who would not do anything whatever that was wrong, if he knew it—that the proper thing to do is to refer the provisions of this bill relating to the reorganization of the Treasury Department to one of the regular committees, so as to afford an opportunity for the question to be fully examined, and to be heard when there will be more than ten or fifteen Senators present, and when all Senators shall have an opportunity to know what is pending. After an examination by such a committee, it should then be reported to the Senate. I do not care what committee considers the subject, though I suppose the proper committee would be the Committee on Finance or the Committee on the Judiciary.

I could make many suggestions of changes which I think would tend to increase the guards thrown around the Treasury for its protection, and no doubt others could do the same. But to let the bars down in this wholesale way, it seems to me, Mr. President, is improvident and wrong, and I think its results will work evil to our country. Every kind of claim in any part of the country may be presented to the Auditors at will, and the Auditors must keep open doors to every demand made against the Government of the United States.

A claim may be antiquated; it may be as old as the war of the Revolution; it may be entirely groundless, and founded upon forgery or perjury, and yet it may be presented, and if there is no bar between the Treasury of the United States and a false and unfounded claim except one man, and he perhaps trusting everything to his subordinates, I fear that evil results will follow.

It is not wise to break down any of the guards or checks which surround the Treasury. The money of the people of the United States should be sacredly and safely reserved in the future as it has been in the past.

That is all I desire to say, Mr. President.

The papers ordered to be appended to Mr. SHERMAN'S remarks are as follows:

[Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 145, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

April 12, 1894.—Referred to the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed. Mr. CHANDLER presented the following:

STATEMENT OF J. R. GARRISON, LATE DEPUTY FIRST COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY, IN OPPOSITION TO THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE THE METHODS OF ACCOUNTING IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT BY ABOLISHING THE OFFICES OF SECOND COMPTROLLER AND COMMISSIONER OF THE CUSTOMS AND GIVING THE SIX AUDITORS THE POWER TO FINALLY EXAMINE AND CERTIFY ALL CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES, SUBJECT ONLY TO AN APPEAL UNDER LIMITED CONDITIONS TO ONE COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY.

Senate bill No. 1831, and House bill No. 6478, "To improve the methods of accounting in the Department of the Treasury, and for other purposes."

[Bills identical, both introduced March 29, 1894, and each referred to the "Joint Commission of Congress to Inquire into the Status of the Laws Organizing the Executive Departments."]

OBJECTIONS TO THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION—REASONS SHOWING IT TO BE UNWISE, AND THAT IT WILL NOT IMPROVE THE METHODS OF ACCOUNTING IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT. BY J. R. GARRISON, LATE DEPUTY FIRST COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY.

The bills above referred to provide for abolishing the office of Second Comptroller of the Treasury, for taking away from the First Comptroller his power and authority to make detailed examination and final settlement of accounts and claims in his office. Six Auditors provided for are invested with exclusive power and authority to finally examine and certify all accounts and claims in which the United States are concerned, subject to appeal, under conditions specified, to the First Comptroller, who is to be known as the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Accounts are no longer to be certified to the Register of the Treasury, but to a division in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be known as the division of bookkeeping and warrants. The files of accounts are no longer to be kept by the Register (who has been the custodian of the accounts of civil expenditures since the foundation of the Government), but the respective Auditors are to keep the files of the accounts subject to their jurisdiction.

The respective jurisdiction of the six Auditors of the Treasury (excepting that of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department) is very materially modified.

In order to clearly comprehend the effect and scope of the proposed legislation the two bills referred to must be considered in connection with Senate bill No. 1738 and House bill No. 5750, which are identical, both introduced March 6, 1894, and provide for abolishing the office of Commissioner of Customs and concentrating in the First Auditor the sole and final authority as to examining and certifying customs accounts and all other accounts subject to the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Customs, with the right of appeal to the First Comptroller under specified conditions.

Right here it must be observed that this last-named bill, in section 3, provides that the First Auditor shall certify to the Register of the Treasury the accounts now subject, under existing law, to the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Customs, and this bill (H. R. 5750) was passed by the House March 8, 1894.

But by the bill introduced March 29, 1894, above referred to (Senate No. 1831, identical with H. R. No. 6478), in section 5, it is provided that the First Auditor shall have sole and final jurisdiction with respect to the same class of accounts—those now subject to the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Customs—but shall certify said accounts to the division of bookkeeping and warrants.

So that by the bills introduced March 6 the Auditor is required to certify a certain class of accounts to the Register of the Treasury, and by the bills introduced March 29 he is directed to certify the same class of accounts to the division of bookkeeping and warrants. This instance illustrates the mistakes, incongruities, and perplexities that must of necessity arise if the attempt to break up the system of accounting which has prevailed with signal success for more than a century, and to engraft upon what remains a crude and untried system, should be successful and become enacted into law.

REASONS FOR THE PROPOSED CHANGE UNWARRANTED.

The reasons assigned for the proposed legislation to abolish the final revision and certification of accounts and claims by the Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs are two:

1. That the change will expedite the public business and do away with the objectionable delays in the settlement of accounts in the Treasury Department.

2. That it will be economical and save to the Government the salaries of the officials whose offices are abolished and the salaries of such clerks as may be dispensed with.

(1) How far will the proposed changes expedite the public business? The question has been considered as if the delays so much complained of occur only in the offices of the Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs, and it is assumed that if these offices are abolished all the public business will be kept up to date. Facts do not sustain any such line of argument. The delay in the Auditors' offices have been quite as much as those in the offices of the Comptrollers and the Commissioner, in all probability more, except in isolated cases where the Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs have necessarily held up accounts and claims pending investigation of frauds or the production of necessary evidence. A full and fair investigation, not confined to a single Auditor or to any special class of accounts, will demonstrate the correctness of this statement.

Again, nearly all accounts pass through some Executive Department for administrative action or approval, and it is just here that most delays occur. Well-authenticated cases might be cited in which the head of some Department has complained to the First Comptroller of the supposed delay of his office in passing some account or claim when investigation has developed the fact that the very account was lying unacted upon in the Department from which complaint emanated.

The commission, and particularly their experts, lay great stress upon the value and importance of the so-called administrative action by the Departments on accounts and claims, supposing that such action may take the place of the detailed examination by the Comptroller of the Treasury Department, but the delays caused by such administrative action seem to have altogether escaped their attention.

The proposed change materially modifies the jurisdiction of each of the six Auditors (except that of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department); divests the Register of the Treasury of his authority as official bookkeeper of the Department and custodian of its files; provides that accounts shall be certified to a new division, and that each of the Auditors shall keep his own files of accounts. To illustrate how radical the change will be, internal-revenue accounts which have gone to the Fifth Auditor under provisions of law since the present internal-revenue system was inaugurated will, under the proposed change, go to the First Auditor, while judiciary accounts and other accounts relating to the Department of Justice, which have always been under the jurisdiction of the First Auditor, will, if the proposed bills are enacted, go to the Fifth Auditor.

It does not require argument to show that to prepare the proper books and blanks necessary to inaugurate the proposed change in the system, to transfer the files and prepare places or rooms for them, to familiarize the officials and clerks with their new duties, and to do all things necessary to change the well-established order of things which has existed for a century, and to adapt it to the new conditions, must take time. The changing of the files will not only be productive of confusion, perplexity, and delay in the dispatch of business, but will necessarily require considerable labor by competent clerks to assort and properly distribute the vast accumulation of accounts and records, and will be attended with heavy expense.

While the new order of things is being established the regular routine work of adjusting accounts will fall behind. It is not an extravagant estimate to say that if the present clerical force is left intact it will be some years, at least, before the system is in thorough running order and the work brought and kept up to date. But with the large reduction in the clerical force recommended by the commission and their experts it is inevitable that the public business will soon fall greatly in arrears, much more so than at present. The claim that the proposed changes will expedite the public business and obviate delays is not well founded.

(2) How far will the proposed changes prove to be measures of economy? There will be a saving of the salaries of the officials who are dispensed with, to wit: the Commissioner of Customs and deputy, Second Comptroller and deputy, and Deputy First Comptroller. But against this it should be borne in mind that the First Comptroller is to be continued as Comptroller of the Treasury at a salary of $5,500 per annum, in lieu of his present salary of $5,000, with an assistant comptroller at $5,000 per annum, and a chief clerk at $2,500 per annum. The experts recommend that the salaries of the 6 Auditors shall be $4,000 instead of $3,600, and that there be 10 principal clerks in the Comptroller's office at $2,000, in the place of 4 chiefs of division at $2,100.

The bills referred to do not provide for the changes in the clerical forces. The experts in their report estimate the number of clerks to be dispensed with, but this is entirely problematic. For the reasons stated, if the clerical force is reduced to the extent recommended by the experts, the public business must fall behind for several years until the new system has been inaugurated and put in satisfactory operation. The cost of the necessary books, blank forms, printing, arranging files, cases, and lockers for the files of the several Auditors, moving and arranging the vast number of accounts now in the several file rooms, and other necessary expenses incident to the change must be taken into consideration. The saving in dollars and cents, if any, will by no means be as great as that estimated by the experts, for they have ignored the fact that the proposed change must be attended with heavy expenses and much extra work, for which they have made no estimate.

PROTECTION AND SAFETY IN A DIVIDED RESPONSIBILITY.

It is claimed by the experts, and assumed by the Commission, that a divided responsibility in the accounting system is no protection to the Government. The best possible answer to this proposition is the record of the accounting system of the Treasury for more than a century. No one can examine the facts without being forced to acknowledge that the Government has been protected against fraud, collusion, and consequent loss, in a most remarkable degree. Can it be safely asserted that this is owing solely to the honesty and integrity of the officials and clerks, and that the accounting system instituted by the act of September 2, 1789, which established the Treasury, inaugurated under the supervision and special approval of Alexander Hamilton, has in no way contributed to the result?

During the many years of Republican administration after the late war it was continually asserted by the party in opposition that a change was essential in order that the books of the Treasury might be examined, and the frauds, which a long lease of power is sure to beget, might be brought to light. This claim was even made by Gen. Hancock, when a candidate for the Presidency. But when the change did come, and the Democratic party came into power, the books were examined, and the most rigorous scrutiny was given to the accounting system, but no frauds were discovered. The system is a sure check and spy upon fraud, and none can go long undiscovered so long as the integrity of the system is preserved. No falsification of the books and records of the Treasury Department has been discovered, no corrupt collusion between the accounting officers has been brought to light, and the losses arising within the Department from fraudulent transactions are few in number and trifling in amount.

These are mainly, if not entirely, cases of skillful forgery on the part of dishonest clerks, of such a character as would not ordinarily be detected in a bank or business house, and which escaped the scrutiny of both accounting officers for the time being. They were, however, soon discovered, and the guilty parties arrested, tried, and punished. These cases were adverted to and urged upon the attention of the House in the debate on the bill (H. R. No. 5750) for abolishing the office of Commissioner of Customs, by those favoring the measure, as argument to show that the office of Comptroller in the Treasury is not a safeguard because these frauds were not discovered by that officer or in his office. And it may be here noted, parenthetically, that some of the cases brought up for the purpose of arraigning the office of Comptroller were those for which the Comptroller was in no sense responsible—notably the Burnside defalcation for sales of waste paper, an account pertaining to postal revenues settled exclusively by the Sixth Auditor, and never coming before the Comptroller; and the Ewing defalcation, which was really brought to light by a letter of the First Comptroller to the Attorney-General, complaining of Ewing's neglect in rendering his accounts, and stating that the Comptroller would recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury that no further requisitions of the Attorney-General in Ewing's favor be honored, unless his accounts in arrears were promptly and satisfactorily rendered. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 9, 1894, volume 26, No. 71, pages 3358 to 3370.)

The record of the accounting system of the Treasury for more than a century, when compared with that of the fiscal departments of the States and of public and private corporations throughout the country, is marvelous and speaks volumes in favor of the "divided responsibility and double check," the opinions of the experts to the contrary notwithstanding. The losses to the Government arising within the Treasury Department, as compared to the vast amounts involved as receipts and expenditures, are indeed insignificant, and the result is astonishing when the comparison is extended to the stupendous and frequent defalcations, reaching millions of dollars, which have occurred and are still occurring in the treasuries of various States, and of city governments, in the offices of State and city treasurers, auditors, and comptrollers, as well as in public and private corporations and individual concerns. These frauds are accomplished by the result of one-man power—single responsibility, under which systematic falsification of books and records has been made possible, and successfully carried out for years without detection. Is it wise to open the Treasury of the United States to such possibilities?

The commission, in their report of March 29, 1894 (House Report No. 637, page 2), quote from a report made to Congress in 1842, by a "select committee on retrenchment," arguing against the system of divided responsibility, claiming that it does not prevent wrongdoing, but often promotes negligence and fraud, and that "the complex system of expenditure and account is one of the greatest practicable obstructions to economy and responsibility in the Government." It is sufficient answer to this remarkable statement, now invoked to arraign the accounting system inaugurated under Hamilton, that it had no influence on Congress at the time; that body in its wisdom did not see fit to adopt the views of the "select committee." In 1842, and it looks as if valid reasons for breaking down the accounting system are wanting when this back number is resurrected from the dust of the past. The commission say (on the same page of said report): "It is clear that the present mode of settling accounts does not answer the demands of public justice or economy; and it is also clear that the divided responsibility does not protect the Government." The views or arguments adduced by the commission in support of this strong assertion are those of the experts, which will presently be adverted to.

The above statement of the commission must have been made hastily, relying on the views of the experts, for it is in direct contradiction of the views of some of the ablest men of our country, who have emphatically favored a divided responsibility in the accounting system—the independent action of a Comptroller and an Auditor. At the first session of Congress (May, 1789), in the debate on the question whether there should be a board or a single head to manage the finances of the United States, Mr. Madison objected to the former, as follows: "If a board is established, the independent offices of Comptroller and Auditor are unknown; you give the aggregate of these powers to the board, the members of which are equal; therefore you give more power to each individual than is proposed to be intrusted to the Secretary." (Debates in Congress, volume 1, O. S., pages 384-408.)

Mr. Baldwin, who subsequently brought in the bill to establish the Treasury Department, said he hoped "to see proper checks provided—a Comptroller, Auditors, Register, and Treasurer." He "would not suffer the Secretary to touch a farthing of the public money beyond his salary. The settling of the accounts should be in the Auditors and Comptroller, the registering them to be in another officer, and the cash in the hands of one unconnected with either." (Id., 408.)

After Mr. Hamilton had been succeeded as Secretary of the Treasury by Oliver Wolcott, who was promoted from the office of Comptroller, he (Mr. Hamilton) advised the President as to the proper officer to whom should be assigned the temporary execution of the Comptroller's Office, made vacant by Mr. Wolcott's appointment as Secretary. In this letter Mr. Hamilton treats in extenso of the complicated system and divided responsibility of the Treasury Department, emphasizing the importance of the separate, independent action of each officer as a check upon the other, even referring to the Register as exercising an important check, "first upon the Secretary and Comptroller, whose warrants he must register and sign before they can take effect; and secondly, upon the settlements of the Comptroller and Auditor by recording their acts and entering them on the books to the proper accounts." In referring to the Comptroller, Mr. Hamilton says his "office imports the second trust in the Department," and he refers to the Auditor as "the coadjutor of the Comptroller in settlements."

Attorney-General Crittenden, in 1852, addressed to the President an elaborate and exhaustive opinion respecting the duties and powers of the accounting officers of the Treasury, growing out of a question of conflicting jurisdiction between the Commissioner of Customs and the Secretary of the Treasury. The learned Attorney-General traces minutely each step in the accounting system established by the organic act of September 2, 1789, and dwells upon the high importance of each process, the separate and independent action of the officers of the Treasury upon whom rest the duty of examining and certifying accounts and claims; that of the Auditor in examining and settling accounts and claims and reporting his balances thereon to the Comptroller (or to the Commissioner of Customs, as the case may be) for his decision thereon; of the Comptroller (or the Commissioner of Customs) in reëxamining and certifying the balances to the Register of the Treasury, and of the Register in recording the same, and (where payment is to be made) certifying to the Secretary of the Treasury "a copy of the balance of the account as audited and adjusted (by the Auditor), and certified to the Register by the Comptroller."

In the opinion of Mr. Crittenden, each of the separate steps, by the independent, separate action and divided responsibility of the officer named, is essential as a "safeguard against improper expenditures of the public money," and as the necessary legal process upon which the Secretary of the Treasury may issue a warrant for payment "which shall be warranted by law." (5 Ops. Atty. Gen., 630-658.) See also Opinion of Attorney-General Taft, February 7, 1877 (15 Ops. Atty. Gen., 192), as to the effect of settlements by the accounting officers.

In 12 United States Court of Claims Reports, page 553, occurs the following statement as to the divided responsibility of the accounting officers and the necessity therefor: "But for the settlement of accounts against the United States there is established by law a peculiar and well-appointed system, which requires in each case careful examination and consideration and the judgment and decision of high officers, appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, called 'accounting officers,' of two distinct classes, acting separately, the Comptrollers reviewing and finally passing upon the action of the Auditors."

The same principle as to the propriety, necessity, and safeguard, in the separate, independent action of the two distinct classes of accounting officers (Auditors and Comptrollers) is recognized in McKnight vs. The United States (13 C. Cls., 292-319), which gives an elaborate and instructive review of the accounting system; and also in numerous decisions of the United States Supreme Court, among which reference may be made to—

Smith vs. The United States (5 Peters, 291).
Watkins vs. The United States (9 Wallace, 759).
United States vs. Gaussen (19 Wallace, 198).
United States vs. Stone (106 U. S., 525).
United States vs. Johnston (124 U. S., 236).
United States vs. Waters (133 U. S., 215).

Having shown what weight of authority may be cited (and my statement is by no means all that might be referred to) in favor of the system of divided responsibility and its importance as a safeguard and protection to the Government, we come now to consider the views of the experts, adopted by the Commission, in support of the claim that a divided responsibility in the accounting system "does not protect the Government."

It is claimed that 90 per cent of the expenditures of the Government are now paid through disbursing officers "who are under bond and take especial care to pay out money only for purposes clearly authorized by law, who, indeed, are authorized to obtain the decisions of the Comptroller as to the construction of statutes before making payments," and that as such disbursing officers "primarily satisfy themselves of the correctness of their accounts," and that "as the administrative officers also examine and approve these accounts coming under their control before they go to the Auditor," the final revision or detailed examination by the Comptroller may be safely dispensed with, and the whole matter left to the sole discretion and conclusive action of the Auditor.

As a legal proposition it may be said that section 2 of the act of March 3, 1817, now section 236 of the United States Revised Statutes, which requires that "all claims and demands whatever, by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or as creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the Department of the Treasury," never contemplated that the primary examination by a disbursing officer of his own accounts, or the administrative action of any Executive Department in approving them, could take the place of one of the examinations and audits required to be performed in the Treasury Department. And as a business proposition it appears unreasonable and fallacious to claim that such examination and administrative action can be safely taken as a substitute for the critical and detailed examination such accounts now receive in the Comptroller's Office.

Furthermore, the commission and their experts seem to have looked at the question with the view of accounting for expenditures alone, not considering the importance of a proper and rigorous examination of the accounts of the officers who receive and collect the revenues of the Government amounting to $500,000,000 annually.

Doubtless a bonded disbursing officer will, if honest, seek to render correct accounts and avoid errors for which he and his sureties must be held accountable. This may be said of any officer who renders accounts to the Government. If all disbursing officers were beyond the reach of temptation and strictly honest, there might be some force in what is said regarding their primary examination to see that their own accounts are correct. But it must be remembered that some of the heaviest losses to the Government have been through the defalcations of some of its disbursing officers.

A dishonest disbursing officer may succeed in corrupting a dishonest auditor, in whom is concentrated the sole and exclusive authority as to settlement of accounts, as is given in the proposed modification and reform of the accounting system. But under the existing system, wherein every account settled by an auditor must receive a detailed examination and revision by a comptroller, such corruption or collusion is impossible, unless both officers can be corrupted. One operates as a check upon the other. Right here it may be observed that the provision for an appeal to the Comptroller in the proposed legislation will not correct any such abuse or fraud as the one above suggested. Dissatisfied claimants may appeal to the Comptroller—and doubtless the Comptroller will have his hands full of such appealed cases—where the Auditor is vigilant and active in seeking to protect the interests of the Government.

But what protection is there to the Government against the action of a dishonest auditor, who for bribe, or favor, prejudice, bias, or any improper motive, rules against the interest of the Government, or suffers extravagant and dishonest expenditures to pass? Neither the Secretary nor the Comptroller can be advised of any such action, unless it be accidentally discovered, and therefore there can be no reason or motive why either of them shall order an appeal to the Comptroller in such cases. Neither will the routine duty required of the auditors in the bills before named, of reporting to the Comptroller their decisions upon the construction of statutes, serve to prevent, or check, or disclose collusive or dishonest practices, or the corrupt and dishonest allowance of accounts or claims by them. The proposed legislation breaks down the all-important safeguard that the divided responsibility imposes—one office acting as a check upon the other. In this connection it is proper to advert to this remarkable assertion, to be found in the report of the experts (page 34, H. R. Report No. 637):

"The present system of accounting is practically but one check, as the audit of the Comptroller is final and independent of any examinations or audits previously made, and the Government is protected by the accounting branch only so far as the audit of the Comptroller is efficient."

This is stated as an axiomatic truth, no argument or reason whatever being assigned in its support. Can it be supposed that because the Comptroller's action is final and conclusive that for this reason the Auditor is no check upon him? Such a view is without foundation in fact. A comptroller who might be inclined to reverse the Auditor's action, and make an illegal allowance or certify a false balance, would hesitate to do so, because his illegal action would, in the ordinary course of business, soon become known to the Auditor, and thus brought to light.

An honest auditor would not hesitate to report to the Secretary, to the President, or to Congress, if necessary, the dishonest and illegal action of a comptroller. The same principle applies to the clerks in the Comptroller's Office. They might be tempted to corrupt or dishonest action in the settlement of an account or claim, but the knowledge that their wrongdoing would shortly come to the knowledge of the clerk in the Auditor's Office, who handles the same line of work or class of accounts, would prevent them. The strong probability of speedy detection operates as one of the most potent and effective preventives of wrongdoing. The divided responsibility affords this salutary check. But remove it, and concentrate in one officer, as the proposed legislation concentrates in the Auditor, the sole authority and undivided responsibility in the settlement of accounts and claims, and the temptation to corrupt action and dishonest practice is enhanced as the probability of detection is made remote.

The experts give much weight to the administrative action respecting accounts in the Departments or offices in which they are approved. Such action is in no sense an audit, but merely perfunctory examination of an account for the purpose of ascertaining whether the officer whose account is to be approved has obeyed instructions or kept within prescribed limits. It is not a critical examination of each voucher to test its correctness and pass upon the legality of the expenditure involved. Therefore it can not take the place of the detailed examination made by the Comptrollers. The proposed legislation in no way provides that this so-called administrative action or examination shall be more critical or exact than it has been in the past.

It is well known to all familiar with these matters that thousands of vouchers and accounts annually pass through the accounting offices of the Treasury, bearing the approval of the head of some Department, after the so-called administrative action therein, in which are found gross errors in computation, and many of the charges so approved by the head of the Department are held to be illegal by the Comptroller. The experts, in referring to the proposed change which takes away from the Comptroller the detailed examination of accounts in his office and vests the final authority to pass upon and certify the same in the Auditor, say:

"This will do much toward removing the irritation and friction that is known to exist between the officers connected with the administrative Departments of the Government and the Government's accounting officers."

The experts in making this somewhat naive statement were evidently unmindful of the protracted struggle that existed on the part of the Comptrollers from the foundation of the Government down to 1868 against the undue pressure exercised by heads of Departments in seeking to enforce the allowance of accounts and claims which the Comptrollers held to be extravagant or unwarranted by law. Various opinions by distinguished Attorneys-General of the United States were rendered, some supporting the view that the approval of the head of an Executive Department should control, others in favor of the conclusive authority of the Comptrollers. But Congress settled the vexed question authoritatively and decisively in favor of the Comptrollers by the act of March 30, 1868 (15 Stat., 54), now section 191 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that—

"The balances which may from time to time be stated by the Auditor and certified to the heads of Departments by the Commissioner of Customs or the Comptrollers of the Treasury upon the settlement of public accounts shall not be subject to be changed or modified by the heads of Departments, but shall be conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government and be subject to revision only by Congress or the proper courts."

Here is a legislative sanction and approval of the divided responsibility; the separate and independent action of the Auditor and the Comptroller in the settlement of public accounts, and a recognition of the high and important duties and powers of the office of Comptroller, which is stronger than all else that has been or can be adduced in favor of the present accounting system, and ought to be sufficient reason and authority for its retention.

OBJECTIONABLE FEATURES IN THE PRESENT SYSTEM OF ACCOUNTING.

An objectionable feature in the present system of accounting is that statutes sometimes receive contradictory constructions by the two Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs, each being independent of the others, and their rulings in other matters pertaining to the settlement of accounts are occasionally at variance. This is an objection which can not be overlooked, but it has never occasioned any serious difficulty or loss to the Government. There has been harmony in the construction of the great and important principles, and the difference has related mainly to minor matters in accounting.

Had the original system as inaugurated under Hamilton been preserved intact this difficulty could not have arisen. Instead of creating separate and independent Comptrollers, as the business of the Government increased the one Comptroller might have been granted assistant comptrollers to perform the duties now assigned to the two Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs, and thus many of the difficulties and perplexities in the accounting system would have been avoided. The proposed legislation is not a return to the original system, but a wider departure from it. It vests in the five Auditors the final authority to decide upon matters of account now vested in the Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs. (The Sixth Auditor, since the creation of that office in 1836, has, so to speak, been his own comptroller.)

Under the proposed reform there will be six Auditors, each of whom may make decisions, and these decisions will not always be harmonious. If specially appealed to the Comptroller the contradictory decisions will be harmonized; but, as already shown, the process provided will not bring all of such cases before the Comptroller. The remedy proposed for the objectionable feature of contradictory decisions will aggravate rather than cure the evil.

The delay in the transaction of the public business is urged as an objectionable feature in the present accounting system. But the delays that exist are not the fault of the system, but arise from lack of administrative force and proper dispatch of business in Executive Departments and in the accounting offices. As already shown, these delays can not be attributed solely to the Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs. The facts will not warrant any such conclusion.

For example: Postal accounts settled by the Sixth Auditor, which do not go to the Comptroller for revision or detailed examination, have been as much in arrears as the accounts in any bureau in the Treasury Department.

Furthermore, for reasons already stated, the proposed legislation, in overturning a well-established system and radically changing the existing order of things and jurisdiction of offices, will, in all probability, bring about greater delays and cause the public business to fall still further behind.

CRITICISM OF SPECIAL SECTIONS OF SENATE BILL NO. 1831 AND HOUSE BILL NO. 6478.

Section 1.—The reasons assigned for the change in the nomenclature of the several Auditors, designating them as Auditor for the Treasury Department, Auditor for the War Department, etc., are fanciful rather than real. The title designates the jurisdiction of the particular Auditor only superficially. True, the Auditor for the Treasury Department will have jurisdiction of all accounts and business coming under the Treasury Department, but it will still be a question to be determined (and sometimes not without difficulty) to say just what accounts and business do come under the Treasury Department, and in like manner with respect to each of the other Executive Departments.

For this fanciful change in title the existing jurisdiction of the Auditors is to be radically overturned, which will be inevitably attended with great confusion, and render it extremely difficult after the lapse of years to trace the payments of accounts and claims. This is no slight evil, as there is no statute of limitations against the Government, and it is a matter of frequent occurrence in the Departments to have old claims, long since paid, brought before the accounting officers and other officials, and their payment urged.

The present division of jurisdiction between the several Auditors is broader and more philosophic than that given in the proposed change. Under the existing system all military and naval accounts go to the three Auditors (the Second, Third, and Fourth), and all civil accounts go to the First, Fifth, and Sixth Auditors, and to the Commissioner of the General Land Office (as Auditor of public-land accounts). The division between the several auditors is very simple; military accounts are assigned to the Second and Third Auditors, the jurisdiction of each being clearly defined; naval account to the Fourth Auditor; post-office and postal-revenue accounts to the Sixth Auditor; public-land accounts to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; the Fifth Auditor has accounts accruing in the Department of State, internal-revenue accounts, and a few others specially assigned to him by statute; and the First Auditor, as the original Auditor, has jurisdiction of all civil accounts not assigned by law to another Auditor. No difficulty can arise as to jurisdiction under the foregoing plain and simple provisions.

This well-defined jurisdiction it is proposed to break down; to divide up the files of accounts between the Auditors for the several Departments, and to combine in one Auditor jurisdiction both of military and civil accounts, in another jurisdiction of naval and civil accounts, and to radically change the jurisdiction of each (except that of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, whose jurisdiction is not invaded).

Another very grave objection to an Auditor for an Executive Department is that he is liable to be unduly influenced by the will of the head of that Department, with whom he is brought in immediate contact. A Cabinet officer is a powerful factor in the administration of the General Government, and it is not overstating the case to say that an Auditor of a particular Executive Department will become a subordinate of the head of that Department, and in a great measure subservient to his will.

Section 2.—The provision in the latter part of this section as to the important duty of bringing suit against delinquent officers and their sureties is very vague and unsatisfactory. It is that "the Auditors, under the direction of the Comptroller of the Treasury, shall superintend the recovery of all debts finally certified by them, respectively, to be due to the United States." Bearing in mind that the Comptroller of the Treasury, as provided for in this bill, has appellate jurisdiction only of accounts, whose duty will it be, if the bill should become a law, to certify transcripts of accounts to the Solicitor of the Treasury for suit? The specific provisions of sections 3624, 3625, and 3633 of the Revised Statutes, imposing this duty on the Comptroller and the Commissioner of Customs, seems to have been overlooked in drafting this bill, and the general language employed leaves the matter in doubt.

The above-named sections are not specifically repealed, and as the First Comptroller is continued under the title of Comptroller of the Treasury, would the duty of certifying transcripts of accounts to the Solicitor still remain as one of his duties? The perplexity is augumented by the fact that the bill for abolishing the office of Commissioner of Customs, which passed the House of Representatives March 8, 1894 (House bill 5750, and House bill 1738), in section 2 provides for amending section 3625 by inserting therein the words "First Auditor of the Treasury," instead of the words "Commissioner of Customs."

Section 3.—The provision in this section that "The returns of fees mentioned in section 1725 of the Revised Statutes shall be made as prescribed by the Comptroller of the Treasury," conflicts directly with the authority conferred by law upon the President, and takes from the President and vests in the Comptroller a duty specifically assigned by the statute to the President.

The fees referred to in section 1725, Revised Statutes, are consular fees, and the form of rendering these fees is invariably contained in the consular regulations prescribed by the President through the Secretary of State, as the law provides. Section 1725 must be construed in connection with sections 1745 and 1752, Revised Statutes. Section 1745 authorizes the President to prescribe "the rates of tariff of fees to be charged for official services" by consular officers of the United States, and section 1752 authorizes the President to prescribe the regulations and issue the orders governing all diplomatic and consular officers of the United States, in relation to their duties, "The transaction of their business, the rendering of their accounts and returns," etc.

These regulations are always prepared by the Secretary of State and officially prescribed by the President, and in them are always included the tariff of fees which the President is specifically authorized to prescribe (section 1745), and the form of rendering the "return" thereof (section 1725). The authority to prescribe the forms of accounting and returns for diplomatic and consular officers of the United States is vested by law in the President who acts through the Secretary of State.

SECTION 5.—The objections to changing the jurisdiction of the Auditors, as now fixed by law, have already been fully stated. The proposed change of certifying balances to the division of bookkeeping and warrants instead of to the Register is ill-advised. The records of all civil accounts and the files thereof have been with the Register since the Treasury Department was established. The Register, in the opinion of Hamilton, Crittenden, and other able statesmen, who were thoroughly familiar with the accounting system, is one of the checks upon which the Secretary must rely in granting warrants upon settlements. If any improvement or reform is to be made all the files and all the records should be kept in the Register's office, as is provided in the organic act creating the Treasury Department. The proposed change will produce great confusion and can be productive of no good.

Section 6.—In this section, beginning at line 26, the following clause occurs: "Any person accepting payment under a settlement by an Auditor shall be precluded from obtaining a revision of such settlement." This is very obscure as to the real meaning, and the rest of the section does not throw light upon it. Does it mean that if any officer's or claimant's accounts are settled in the ordinary course of business, and a Treasury draft sent to him, which he accepts, negotiates, and receives the money thereon, that he has "accepted payment" in the sense of the proposed statute, and is therefore precluded from obtaining a revision of the settlement, even for good and satisfactory cause shown? The intent of the statute should be made plain. The objections to the provision in this section authorizing the Auditors to keep their own files of accounts have already been fully stated.

Section 8. The advantages of certifying accounts to the Register instead of to a division in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury have already been adverted to. It is inconsistent with the general theory of the duties of the Secretary, as fixed by law, to require his office to perform duties which appertain to the Register so long as the office of Register remains.

Sections 9 and 10.—The duties required of the Auditors in these sections as to passing upon requisitions for advance of public money to disbursing officers are substantially those which are now performed by the Comptrollers, and do not provide any better protection for the Government. And the provisions as to the rendition of accounts do not materially differ from the existing law touching this matter (section 3622, Revised Statutes), as modified by subsequent acts, which authorize quarterly rendition of accounts, but give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to require their rendition more frequently.

This claim, set up as to the great improvement in the system and the better protection to the Government that will inure from these two sections (9 and 10) if enacted, is not well founded.

Section 12. The provision in this section that claims presented to an Auditor which have not had administrative examination shall be "examined by two of his subordinates independently of each other" is, to say the least, a very inadequate and unsatisfactory substitute for the separate, independent, detailed examination of such claims in the Comptrollers' offices, for which this provision is intended as a substitute.

It is respectfully submitted that a candid consideration of the foregoing objections, in connection with the manifest advantages of the present system of accounting, will demonstrate that the proposed changes are unsafe and unwise, and ought not to be adopted.

It appears strange that the experts in their examination of the Treasury Department have passed by many features which to those thoroughly familiar with its workings are regarded as useless and unnecessary, and have aimed their first and only blow at the distinctive and most important feature in the accounting system, the office of Comptroller, regarded by Hamilton as the "second trust in the Department," often spoken of as "the key of the Treasury," and which none of the great Secretaries from the days of Hamilton to the present time have considered as unnecessary or unessential.

In the report of Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, made to the Senate in 1834, from which the commission quote, there is no suggestion that the office of Comptroller might be safely dispensed with, or that the divided responsibility of the Auditor and the Comptroller is not a wise and salutary feature in the accounting system. The report recommended simplification of methods, and the present commission say, after quoting largely from Secretary Woodbury's report: "It is evident that some simplification of the present methods is necessary." It is not shown in what way the methods proposed will simplify existing methods; on the contrary, it is not overstating the case to say that the radical changes introduced will produce greater confusion. The honorable members of the commission, engrossed with their own duties as legislators, and not familiar with the details of the accounting system and offices, have necessarily relied upon their experts.

The experts employed as salaried agents to discover defects in the existing system of accounting and to correct them, could hardly be expected to approve the system as satisfactory. Naturally they arrayed themselves against existing methods and greatly magnified the defects and evils which appeared to exist. A perusal of their report clearly shows it to be an arraignment of the present accounting system, and not a judicial and impartial consideration of its merits and defects. In their efforts to improve it they have recommended the striking down of its most important feature and the destruction of one of the essential safeguards of the public Treasury.

NO. 1320 F STREET NW., Washington, D. C., April 10, 1894.

SIR: Having been for thirty years employed in various positions in the office of First Comptroller of the Treasury, and filled the office of Deputy First Comptroller for eight years and left the Department with an honorable record, I naturally feel much interest in the proposed legislation, which practically abolishes the office of Comptroller in the accounting system of the Department (Senate bill No. 1738 and House bill No. 5750, introduced March 8, 1894, also Senate bill No. 1831 and House bill No. 6478, introduced March 29, 1894).

I have therefore prepared the inclosed argument against the proposed changes, but without any personal or pecuniary interest whatever in the matter.

I trust you may have the time and inclination to read it.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. R. GARRISON.

Hon. WM. E. CHANDLER,
United States Senate.

THE SYSTEM OF ACCOUNTING IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT—ITS ORIGIN AND GROWTH—THE OFFICE OF SECOND COMPTROLLER A PUBLIC SAFEGUARD.

The general scope of the Treasury Department, and the functions of its several bureaus, can be clearly understood only by means of the information obtained from a close observation of the system of public accounting which has worked so satisfactorily, with few interruptions, for more than three-quarters of a century.

The present system of settling public accounts has been in operation since the year 1817.

By the act of March 3, 1817, the offices of accountants in the War and Navy Departments were abolished, and the appointment of an additional Comptroller (the Second Comptroller of the Treasury) and four Auditors was provided for.

It was evidently the intent of the framers of the act of 1817 to establish a tribunal for the settlement and adjustment of accounts against the Government that should be wholly independent of control or revision by those Departments or offices by whom the public expenditures and liabilities are incurred.

The Comptrollers were, by the act of 1817, stationed over the several Departments as checks upon their expenditures. They are not clerks of but are checks upon the heads of Departments. They are the depositaries of special powers. Their functions are so far judicial that President Madison at one time urged that their tenure of office should be independent of the Executive. It is evident that only through an intimate acquaintance with departmental history can the jurisdiction of the Comptrollers be known or the embarrassment and loss that would result from the want of such safeguards be fully estimated.

If, owing to the great growth of the public business, consequent upon the expansion and development of the country, errors have crept into the system of public accounting and injured the general symmetry of the plan as projected by Hamilton, simplicity and order may readily be restored by prudent and wise legislation. It is not necessary to destroy the system to get at the error.

The best evidence as to the value of the present system lies in the fact that it has stood the test of time, having met all the requirements and demands of the Government from its very foundation down to the present period. By looking back at the ordinance of the old Congress, "for regulating the Treasury and adjusting the public accounts," adopted September 11, 1781 (3 Journals Congress, 666), it will be found that this early ordinance provided for precisely the same officers that were constituted by the act of 1789. The duties of the several officers were also similar.

In fact the act of 1789 only continued in operation the old system that had been in existence under the early ordinance from 1781. The same system was preserved by the act of 1817, but it was enlarged and extended to meet the conditions growing out of a great increase of the public business. That is substantially the system which exists to-day. So that it may be said that the present system of accounting has continued, with but few interruptions, and only such changes as were made necessary by the growth of the country, from 1781 to the present time, or one hundred and thirteen years. It would seem, therefore, that a system that has worked satisfactorily for that long period ought not to be disturbed without good and valid reasons. It is not believed that such reasons exist.

The practical effect of the contemplated changes, if made, will be to do away with all revision of the accounts and claims, after their settlement by the several Auditors of the Treasury, except in those few cases where appeal shall be taken to the Comptroller of the Treasury, as provided in the bill "To improve the methods of accounting in the Department of the Treasury, and for other purposes." To some extent this right of appeal may be satisfactory to the individual who may generally be relied upon to see that his own interests are protected, but who is to guard with equal care the interests of the Government? It may be answered that provision is also made that the Secretary of the Treasury may, within a stated time, obtain a revision of any account. To the superficial observer this may look like adequate protection, but to the experienced accountant it would seem to be throwing away the substance and retaining only the shadow.

If the Comptroller of the Treasury is to have action on only those few cases appealed to him from the Auditors, he is not likely to have in his office the subordinate experts through whom every head of a bureau must work, and on whom he must rely for his information and for the performance of the detailed work. Without these experts the accounts could not be properly examined, and the head of the bureau must work at great disadvantage.

Again, as the work of the Auditor is not to be uniformly revised by anybody, only the employés in his office will see the accounts, or know what they contain, what source of information will the Secretary of the Treasury have in regard to them, and how will he determine what particular accounts contain errors prejudicial to the interests of the Government? Is it expected that the Auditor's clerk will call attention to his own errors, even if he becomes aware of them? No; and hence owing to the want of information as to what accounts are improperly adjusted there will be no intelligent revision of accounts, and the interests of the Government will be without adequate protection.

Auditors and their employés are but human, and until the liability to mistakes is eliminated from human action it will be unsafe and unwise to entrust great interests to the exclusive care of one person. An Auditor operates through his clerks, and unless errors are discovered by the clerk, and attention called to the same, the Auditor himself remains in ignorance of the error. If the clerk has a moral or mental defect the error will pass unheeded. His knowledge that the revision of his work is highly improbable will engender careless habits and loose rules of construction.

It should not be forgotten that the famous star route scandal was located in a Department whose accounts are settled by an Auditor without revision by a Comptroller, and that the great swindle and consequent loss to the Government would have defrayed the cost of revision of all Post-Office accounts for half a century or more. Since that time the Sixth Auditor has established within his own office a "Division of Review" of accounts, thus recognizing the necessity of bringing more than one mind to bear upon important questions. The same necessity has been recognized by the committee in framing the present bill, for in section 12 of the bill it is provided that, "In the case of claims presented to an Auditor which have not had an administrative examination, the Auditor shall cause them to be examined by two of his subordinates independently of each other." It is a fact that a large percentage of all claims settled by the Second Comptroller do not receive administrative action, but are filed directly with the accounting officers.

It will be admitted that a rigid scrutiny of official acts tends to keep many in honorable paths who might otherwise be treading devious ways. An ounce of experience is worth many pounds of theory. Search the records of the Comptrollers' offices and you will find innumerable cases where reversal of the Auditor's action has saved the Government large sums, while the amount of wrong prevented is of course incalculable.

Some time during the year 1878 an official claimed to have expended over $30,000 of his private funds for the benefit of the Government. He presented fair vouchers as evidence of the claim. Congress was induced to make an appropriation to reimburse him. The Auditor allowed the claim but the Second Comptroller demurred to the evidence. Investigation proved the claim fictitious, and the next Congress repealed the act of appropriation. Thus this large sum was saved to the Government.

At another time Congress passed an act granting extra pay to certain persons in the service. Ten days after the act became a law a claimant made application for what might be due him thereunder, and he was paid. After the lapse of a number of years the same party again claimed the gratuity. The claim was again certified by the Auditor for allowance, but upon examination by the Second Comptroller it was disallowed upon the ground that the claimant had once been paid in full.

Many other cases could be cited wherein the amount saved by the revision of accounts, after they have been passed by the Auditors, have been large, but it is believed that the two mentioned will suffice to illustrate the value of the double-check system of accounting now practiced.

No one mind is capable of grasping all the different points of the many complex questions which daily arise in the accounting offices. One man will bend his mind to the discovery of noncompliance with prescribed forms. Another will look carefully into the legal status of the transactions; while still another will readily discover all the errors in computation. These different human characteristics are recognized in all the business affairs of life. In our jury system twelve different minds are brought to the determination of questions in order that the facts may be viewed from twelve different standpoints.

The ancient practice of some dignitary "sitting within the gates," hearing and deciding disputes instanter, may have been suited to those primitive times, but it will not satisfy the people of the present day. The complicated affairs of life now require some system adequate to meet the present needs. The system of public accounting established by Hamilton has been reasonably satisfactory for more than one hundred years. To modify that system and remove the checks upon dishonesty and profligacy and place it within the power of one man to decide what is lawful and proper (be he ever so honest), is an experiment fraught with untold danger and the possible loss of large sums of money, compared to which the saving in clerk hire will be insignificant.

The work necessarily involved in the examination and settlement of claims and accounts coming before the Second Comptroller's Office can not be fully expressed in figures. Even if it were practicable to convey by tabulated statements a definite idea of the work, such statements could not be clearly understood except by those who have given long and close personal attention to the work.

The necessity for the work of revision is made apparent by the fact that in 1,160 claims examined in the office of Second Comptroller during the present fiscal year, errors aggregating $34,800.63 were discovered and corrected, being $23,370.38 reported by the Auditor for allowance, to which claimants were not entitled, and $11,439.30, not reported by the Auditor, but found due claimants under the laws and decisions applicable to the cases and allowed by the Second Comptroller; also by the further fact that in 387 accounts of disbursing officers errors aggregating $453,288.63 were discovered and corrected.

In connection with this subject attention is invited to the "joint report from the Secretaries of the different Departments respecting the annual settlement of the public accounts," hereinafter set forth, which was made to the Senate at the second session of the Fourteenth Congress. This report is dated December 6, 1816.

It is an anomaly to be noted that the reasons which appear to have influenced the committee in 1816 in recommending the establishment of the office of Second Comptroller are practically the reasons now urged for the abolishment of the same office. If the condition of the public business at that early date warranted the appointment of an additional Comptroller, how can its present condition be considered to justify the abolishment of that office?

Attention is also invited to the accompanying tabulated statement showing the number of claims and accounts revised by the Second Comptroller during the present fiscal year; also the number of corrections made therein, and the amount disallowed by the Comptroller in said revision.

The bill lately introduced into the Senate and House of Representatives, entitled "A bill to improve the methods of accounting in the Department of the Treasury, and for other purposes," ought properly be entitled "A bill to open the doors to frauds upon the Treasury, and for the benefit of claim agents, and for other purposes."

The bill is vicious and dangerous, and bears upon its face evidence of having been drafted by men without practical experience in Treasury accounting, and without knowledge of the methods they propose to remedy. It is supposed to be a bill to simplify the system which has been in successful existence for almost a century, whereas it is in truth and in fact a bill to confuse and confound.

The reëxamination of accounts, and review of the action of the several Auditors is removed, and a feeble attempt to preserve the checking system by a review established within the several bureaus, thus abolishing the Comptrollers' offices.

Time will not permit an exhaustive brief on this unsafe innovation, but a few salient points can be presented which will show the wrongful tendencies of the proposed legislation.

If enacted into a law it will radically change the system of checks and balances which have so long given satisfaction to both officers and the people.

The bureaus of the First and Second Comptroller, as Comptrollers, are abolished, and in their stead a judge of a court of appeals and an assistant judge are to be substituted, under the name of "The Comptroller of the Treasury and Assistant Comptroller." They will have practically little to do with questions of law, because, as will be seen by an examination of the bill, under the system proposed very few appeals will be taken, as will be shown.

Section 4 amends section 271, Revised Statutes, as follows:

"SEC. 271. The Comptroller of the Treasury, in any case where, in his opinion, the interests of the Government require it, shall direct any of the Auditors forthwith to audit and settle any particular account which such Auditor is authorized to audit and settle."

Now it does not appear how the Comptroller of the Treasury is to know when the interests of the Government demand the settlement of any account unless it be shown in very few cases which are brought to him on appeal; and it is not for a moment to be presumed that Auditors will appeal from their own rulings, and claimants will scarcely venture to invoke such remedy.

The judge and assistant judge, it is true, will have certain duties and powers, the first named having full control; the assistant such duties as his chief may assign him, being chiefly clerical. The revision of the accounting of the several Auditors is entirely removed from the Comptroller, and except upon questions of law (and as has been shown few will arise under the proposed bill) he and his assistant will have plenty of time for recreation.

To speak more plainly, the Comptrollers are shorn of all power, and the several Auditors become the most important officers in the Treasury, ranking in powers for mischief the higher officials. Their action in almost every case will be final, and no matter how great the fraud, there will be no redress either upon the part of the Government or the citizens. The Government will stand powerless in their presence.

To illustrate, attention is called to lines 26 to 28, page 8 of the bill, where it says: "Any person accepting payment under a settlement by an Auditor shall be precluded from obtaining a review of such settlement." Can any legislative enactment be more unjust, more arbitrary? A citizen having a claim pending before the Auditor of the Treasury Department is allowed $1,000. He believes he ought to have more, but not having access to the books and may be pressed for money, accepts it as the best thing that can be done. After a time it is made known to him that the Government owed him $2,000 instead of $1,000, and he modestly asks a revision. He files his petition and is confronted with the above enactment, being practically informed that "mistakes are not corrected in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury." The unfortunate claimant has but one remedy left, and that is an appeal to Congress or the Court of Claims; and sensible men know that is a very doubtful remedy.

Can any law of Congress be more inequitable; nay, more unjust?

But the Government is no better off. Its checking system is gone and it is left to the tender mercies of the accounting officers.

Section 12, recognizing the necessity for the checking system by Comptrollers, in an infirm endeavor tries to preserve it, but it does not. Read what it says:

"SEC. 12. In the case of claims presented to an Auditor, which have not had an administrative examination, the Auditor shall cause them to be examined by two of his subordinates independently of each other."

Mark the words, "the Auditor shall cause them to be examined by two of his subordinates independently of each other." But will they be independent of the Auditor? That is a pertinent question.

To again illustrate. The Auditor of the Treasury, being a man, perhaps of some vanity, of inordinate ambition, and some cupidity (this is merely a supposable case), has a claim pending in his Bureau which is somewhat cloudy. The claimant, knowing his man, "sees" the Auditor and departs. The claim, amounting to $30,000, is taken from the files; the Auditor calls upon his subordinates; gives them his opinion regarding it. However independent they may be of each other, they will not be independent of him, and after an accounting and revision the claim is audited and allowed. The fortunate claimant, of course, will ask for no review; will ask no appeal; the Auditor will certainly not appeal from his own ruling; and the lucky man appears, draws his warrant, and walks out of the Treasury Department with his $50,000—minus the sum it has cost him to "fix" things. This is by no means an extreme case.

Some years ago a claim for some $30,000 ran the gantlet of all the guards against fraud until it reached a division of the Second Comptroller's Office. The clerk whose duty it was to review it made a careful examination, and after such examination pronounced the evidence insufficient and stood by his conviction, notwithstanding there was a good deal of cursing about red tape. A careful investigation was had, resulting in finding the claim fictitious and without foundation. The Auditor's action was reversed, the claim disallowed, and $30,000 was saved to the taxpayers. This is but one of hundreds of such instances, and will it be safe to tear down such a system and substitute a weakling like said section 12 in its stead? Better cling to the Comptroller's offices as organized in 1817.

There is a report filed with said bill which purports to have been prepared by the three experts who have, it is said, given much time to the examination of departmental methods. If they did prepare the report it reflects no credit upon them, for they display a lamentable ignorance of the subject they pretend to treat. It really needs no answer, because an examination of it in connection with the bill bears its own refutation. To one familiar with the workings of the Second Comptroller's Office it is apparent that these gentlemen named or either of them have never given a day's study to its books. Indeed, it is asserted that not one of the three have ever spent a half day in the Bureau. They have never been seen there but once or twice, and then did not remain in any one room as much as twenty minutes, and some of the rooms they did not visit at all. Their examination and information came from other sources, and they gave little heed to what they were attempting to undo.

But to the report, and a perusal of it will readily show how little they know of what they are talking about, and attention is called to the following culled from it:

"Sections 9 and 10 of this act will do more for the protection of the Government than a dozen reëxaminations of accounts."

It will not do to accept this dicta but go to the act itself, and that will show that said sections 9 and 10 have nothing at all to do with an examination of accounts that will protect the Treasury. Section 9 simply provides for the signing and countersigning of warrants and is no check at all. As a matter of fact, every officer of the Government knows that the Secretary of the Treasury, and the officers under him, are guided by the initials of the different subordinates through whose hands the warrants and accounts must pass, and on them they must rely. They have no time to turn themselves into law professors and bookkeepers, but they must heed the initials, and it is the same to them whether coming from one or a dozen bureaus. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller can not know under section 9 whether an account be correct or not. Such a statement in a report can have but one object, and that to deceive.

A part of said section 9 repeals section 269 and so much of section 365 of the Revised Statutes as requires the Register of the Treasury to record warrants. This of itself is a removal of a check, and gives the Register less to do, while in the report the experts advise that he be given three more divisions and more clerks with less to do. Why, it is not easy to determine. It is an enigma that is not easy of solution.

It will thus be seen (and this may be a repetition) that there is absolutely nothing in section 9 to protect the Government in lieu of a reëxamination of accounts by a different set of officers removed from the influence of the first accounting bureau; and it is amazing that men should make such an assertion and expect people who can read to believe it.

Section 10 does no better. On the contrary, it is confusing and gives no relief. In all candor, where can the experts point to a clause in said section which is a check or balance? It is faulty in the extreme and attempts to provide against possibilities by requiring an impossibility. The entire section is too long to incorporate in this paper, and but one more brief reference will be made to it.

To give the nondescript dignity it is presumed, the services of the President are brought into requisition. It is sufficient to say that he, too, like the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller, must rely upon the initials of his subordinates and sign what is placed before him, else he would have no time to give to other public business. He in this instance is at the mercy of the Auditors, and the men who drafted the bill, if they knew anything, must have known it. It is merely a blind and practically meaningless.

Section 11 is no improvement on the present system, but the reverse. It gives no check upon the Attorney-General in the examination of accounts. It is a tortuous provision, and only removes checks upon the officers who act under him.

Section 13 is merely directory and is already the law.

It is not necessary to analyze the remaining portions of the bill, as they are perhaps necessary should the change asked be unfortunately made.

The fourth section of the bill, however, deserves especial mention.

The Auditor for the Navy Department must certify all his balances to the bookkeeping division, but he has no control over said division. He is made responsible, but has no control of the books to which he must certify his balances. He is at the mercy of a division beyond his jurisdiction. The experts in framing their report, the men who drafted the bill, gave little heed to this lax method to be substituted for the old and satisfactory way of doing business, and the looseness of the proposed act shows they have given no real study to their subject.

The bill, if it should ever become a law, will throw all the naval accounts into an endless muddle. In less than a year Congress will be called upon to reverse its action and restore the system which prevails and gives so little cause for complaint. Every protection is provided now, and appropriations and accounts arising thereunder move like clockwork. To overthrow the system as proposed by the railroad gentlemen will so pile up the difficulties the officers will encounter that a Second Comptroller, with all his powers as they at present exist, must be again created.

So much for a hasty review of this bill of abominations.

Attention is now called to another peculiar phase of the monstrosity.

An attempt is made to preserve all the high class of officials. Whether fearing a resistance on the part of some of them or with a desire to preserve some special interests, something like a logrolling process is apparent.

The Chief Comptroller has an increase in the bill of $500 added yearly to his salary. The experts recommended an increase of a thousand. They (the experts) also recommend that each Auditor be allowed $400 per annum more than is now paid them. This feature has a dubious aspect. If economy is one reason why the bill must become a law, why lessen the duties of the Comptroller and give him a higher salary? Why increase the salaries of the Auditors? This increase is made at the expense of the clerks in the classified service, who must be turned loose with nothing, and chiefs of divisions, who will be turned out of office. This of itself would be a small matter if a great and lasting reform would be accomplished. But when no reform is had, it has a strange and confessedly dark appearance. Its earmarks are not creditable to the authors of the scheme. This shady view is noticed because some one has thought enough of the officers who expect to be retained to increase their emoluments and dignities and at the expense of the Treasury.

But to the estimated saving; $179,000 per annum the railroad men say will be saved. This looks well in print. Will the change save such an amount? With all due deference to men who so declare, it will not! It will save nothing. Already some of the officers who are most interested are declaring that in view of increased labors their allotment of clerks by the experts is too small and they must have more. Where will the end be?

More important, however, is the great safeguard the Commission want to break down. Common rumor says that in the Second Comptroller's Bureau alone there have been errors discovered and a saving to the Government of a half million or more of dollars within the last nine months, or since its present chief became its head. It is confidently believed that this statement can be verified. If true—and it can be easily ascertained if not true—where is the economy of removing such a check, and opening wide the gate to all sorts of chicanery?

Put the sum of $179,000, even if such estimate be correct (and it is very doubtful if it is) against $500,000, and on which side is the economy? The experts had better try again. Better go back to railroading.

Safety to the Government, fair dealing to her citizens, demand something more than to tear down the wisdom of a century.

The flood gates will be raised should the bill pass. Scandals may not come at once, but they will come; and when they do the star-route robberies will pale into insignificance.

With bold and defiant mien, in the light of the noonday sun will the brazen sons of rascality walk into the doors of the Treasury and out again with their ill-gotten gains unheeded and unmolested.

Will it be safe to follow the leadership of Alexander Hamilton, Robert J. Walker, and JOHN SHERMAN, or shall the Congress of the United States bow with humiliation and shame to the superficial vaporings of J. W. Reinhart, C. W. Haskins, and E. W. Sells?

A statement was made this morning that the "experts" called the Auditors together one day this week and told them that an attack had been made upon them. This does not include the Sixth Auditor. It was a meeting of the Auditors called together after receiving a statement prepared by the Comptroller, showing the differences in the settlement of accounts revised by him. The "experts" are trying to induce the Auditors to believe that this officer is making an attack upon their offices, and to array them against the Comptroller, in order that they may facilitate the passage of their scheme.

[Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 167, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

April 27, 1894.—Referred to the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the following:

STATEMENT OF W. I. LEWIS, FORMERLY A CLERK IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, IN OPPOSITION TO THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE THE METHODS OF ACCOUNTING IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT BY ABOLISHING THE OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS AND GIVING THE POWER TO FINALLY EXAMINE AND CERTIFY ACCOUNTS AND CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES TO THE FIRST AUDITOR, SUBJECT ONLY TO AN APPEAL UNDER LIMITED CONDITIONS TO THE FIRST COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY.

[House bill No. 5750, "to improve the methods of accounting in the Department of the Treasury, and for other purposes."]

OBJECTIONS TO THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION—REASONS SHOWING IT TO BE UNWISE, AND THAT IT WILL NOT IMPROVE THE METHODS OF ACCOUNTING IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The office of Commissioner of Customs was created in 1849 to relieve the then overburdened Comptroller.

In a letter dated December 9, 1848, transmitting his annual report to Congress, Hon. Robert J. Walker, then Secretary of the Treasury, one of the ablest Secretaries we have ever had, said:

"The office of the Comptroller of the Treasury should be divided, and that great and augmenting portion of his duties relating to the receipts from customs and the accounts of collectors and other officers of the customs should be devolved upon the head of a new bureau, to be called 'the Commissioner of Customs.' Combined, as now are under the First Comptroller the duties appertaining both to receipts and expenditures of the public money, accounts, and claims, the office is overburdened with business which can not promptly and properly be performed by any one individual, however able and laborious."

So Congress, after due deliberation, created the office of the Commissioner of Customs. The largest portion of the income of the Government is obtained from the customs duties, involving accounts upward of $204,000,000 during the last fiscal year.

By a comparison of the amount of customs duties collected now and the amount collected when this office was created in 1849 it would seem that if there was a necessity then for establishing the office of Commissioner of Customs that necessity must be still greater now.

But it is claimed in the report of the joint commission, No. 409, that the powers of the Commissioner of Customs are not such as were given him at the creation of the office. It is true that some jurisdiction, for various causes, has been absorbed by the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, but it is also true that jurisdiction over additional accounts appertaining to several branches of the service have been added, viz: Life-Saving Service, Shipping Commission, Commission of Immigration, and Chinese Exclusion, and the business of the Government has so largely increased, that the duties of this office are now very much larger than when the office was created.

In the report of the joint commission, No. 409, it is stated that—

"If the Commissioner of Customs had such powers as were given to him at the creation of the office there might be some reason for the existence of the office; but as it is now the said office has no particular function to perform except to revise the customs accounts which have been previously audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury."

The facts are that, in addition to the examination of 6,135 Auditors' certificates and 16,216 accounts adjusted with accompanying vouchers and papers, there has been performed in the office of Commissioner of Customs in the last fiscal year the following work with which the Auditor had no connection, as appears from the annual report of the Commissioner of Customs, viz: 2,095 estimates received and examined and requisitions issued, involving $16,536,915.31; 24,264 letters received and 8,839 letters written; 9,228 letters recorded; 190,107 stubs of receipts for duties and fees returned by collectors; 171,829 stubs of receipts for duties and fees examined and summarized; 12,956 tonnage stubs examined; 13,394 tonnage stubs received and entered; 6,269 Auditors' certificates registered; 18,372 papers filed, noted, and referred; 4,906 appointments registered; 2,951 Auditors' certificates checked by the stubs; oaths examined and registered, official bonds examined and approved, and commissions transmitted, 2,219; and 190 attorneys registered. (Annual Report Commissioner of Customs, 1893.)

That office looks after these matters, all incident to a proper settlement of the accounts, the collection of revenues, and payment of expenditures; bonds are taken from collectors; fines and forfeitures are kept track of; unclaimed and seized goods are watched, and the stub system is a safeguard and pays much more than it costs. The keeping and comparing of transportation and exportation business requires constant attention of that office. A record of refund cases is required by law; also emolument accounts; public fund and cash statements are to be examined and checked, and a large miscellaneous correspondence is necessary to a proper settlement of accounts.

The clerks of that office have been there a long number of years, and have become expert accountants in their special accounts and understand the law relating to such accounts, and to place all this work in the First Auditor's office and put new clerks on it would require a much larger force than the experts have mentioned in their report, and under the proposed change with new clerks, mistakes would be easily made; and if the mistake is against the Government the claimant will not appeal to the Comptroller and the account settled as stated by the clerk will go into the files and the mistake will never be discovered. Bear in mind that the Auditor himself does not examine the account, nor make the computations; the clerks do that and the Auditor approves the sum totals. In the final settlement and collection of balances due when officers retire, especially when there are controverted questions of law and fact, then the system for the settlement of accounts by one officer will be found to be very weak, as is the case in the settlements of accounts by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, which is exceptionally weak, as will appear by the following:

In January, 1886, the House of Representatives passed a resolution calling on the Sixth Auditor for a report of "all balances due to and from the United States, as shown by the books of the offices of the Register and Sixth Auditor of the Treasury Department, from 1789 to June 30, 1885," and in reply, dated March 10, 1886, Hon. D. McConville, the then Auditor, said in his letter:

"I have the honor to inform you that it will probably require the entire services of twenty-five clerks four years to prepare the statement required by the terms of the resolution from this office."

The Commissioner of Customs office is a comptrolling office and a proper function of a comptrolling office is to exhaust all legal means for the collection of moneys due the Government as much as to examine and settle an account, and under the present system it would not take but a few clerks four days, in the Commissioner of Customs office, to prepare a statement of balances if called for by Congress.

If the past experience has any weight in this matter, surely the establishment of this Bureau has been a wise and economical measure.

Take the figures from the books of the Treasury (see Finance Report of the Secretary, 1893) as to the receipts and disbursements in customs matters for a number of years, say thirteen years immediately before the establishment of this office, from 1837 to 1849, inclusive, the receipts were $267,963,513.09, the loss $1,737,758, or about $6,500 to each million of dollars collected. The expenditures for same period were about $18,000,000, and the loss about $25,000, or about $1,400 on each million of dollars disbursed.

Now, take the receipts from 1881 to 1893, inclusive, thirteen years, $2,713,773,187.54 (see Annual Report Commissioner of Customs, 1893), the loss $870.17, or about 32 cents on each million collected. The expenditures for the same period were $280,824,420.12, and the outstanding balances $111,469.54, or $3.97 on each $1,000,000 disbursed.

These figures speak louder than any clamor for change in the system which has worked so admirably.

The Commissioner of Customs, in his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, says:

"The amount of unadjusted indebtedness standing on the books of the Treasury arising from accounts, the settlement of which pertains to this office, is very small * * * in transactions aggregating more than $3,000,000,000, a record of which any government may well be proud."

In the light of the past, is it wise to make the contemplated radical change not yet sanctioned by experience?

Heretofore duties on imports have been the largest single source of revenue to the Government, and will probably continue to be when the commerce and the business of the country are again adjusted on a firm basis; and as the loss has been so small (32 cents on a million) in collecting this large revenue, would it be wise to make radical changes for the sake of change? It may be claimed that some large corporations of the country have had the necessary experience to make such change. But in the light of the financial disasters to railroads all over the country, the comparison of losses between their systems of accounting and financial methods and the system of accounting and financial methods of the Government, judging from results, are very largely in favor of the present safe system of accounting by the Government.

A careful and intelligent examination of the existing system of accounting in all its bearings will show that no person, however expert an accountant, without previous practical experience in the office of the Commissioner of Customs can go into the Treasury and in a few days, or even months, make an examination of the methods of accounting and understand the scope and appreciate the value of the different parts, and arrive at a correct and safe conclusion.

The law now provides for two sets of accounting officers, an auditing and revising office; both are required to examine and certify all accounts under their jurisdiction.

In theory each makes an independent examination; the revising office examining the accounts after they have been certified by the Auditor, just as it would if no previous examination had been made.

But it will be shown that in practice there is an important distinction. If that were not true then the system would apparently provide for a duplication of the work.

The examination of accounts as to the character of the work may be divided into two classes, one clerical, and the other judicial.

The clerical consists in making computations, and seeing that the vouchers are properly receipted, certified, and dated; this requires care and fidelity; therefore a second examination of that character must be to insure such care and fidelity, and to detect and correct errors overlooked.

The principal object of a second examination, however, is to see that all laws and regulations restricting expenditures, and the acts of agents, officers, and other persons having accounts with the Government, have been complied with; ascertaining if the articles purchased and labor employed have been applied to the object provided for by the appropriation from which the expenditures have been made, and whether such were for the service of the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made, or come within a provision of law excepting them from such requirement; and, if furnished by contract, whether there has been strict compliance with the terms of the contract.

This requires a knowledge of the special statutes pertaining to such cases and of the general laws and also the decisions relative to the subject-matter, a clear comprehension of the meaning of words and an experienced judgment in applying the statutes.

In order to operate as an efficient check upon extravagant and illegal expenditures, this work must be done by experienced men of knowledge and ability, and with scrupulous care and fidelity.

This work is now being performed by men of ability and long experience in the office of the Commissioner of Customs, experts in customs accounts.

Under the present system the object of a second examination or revision of the accounts examined by the Auditor is fourfold; to maintain the efficiency of the examinations made in the Auditor's Office; to prevent fraudulent allowances, and to provide additional means for detecting and preventing illegal expenditures; and to enforce a compliance with the law.

If this bill No. 5750 becomes a law and the revision of the examination made in the Auditor's Office is done away with, then the accounts when certified by the Auditor will pass into the files and into obscurity, no matter how many illegal expenditures were passed over without question; there would hardly be the remotest chance for discovery; and mistakes, fraud, and collusion will never be detected, unless under very extraordinary circumstances, and even if discovered, the person rendering the account and the clerk auditing the same would naturally claim it to be only a mistake and criminality would not lie.

If a disbursing officer makes an illegal expenditure or intentionally makes a mistake against the Government, and the account is passed by the clerk, intentionally, or by making the same mistake unintentionally (as is often the case in footing columns, as every experienced accountant knows), or when a claimant is paid the amount of his claim, be it illegal or the result of a mistake, he will let the matter go and remain silent, and the clerk who passes the account will not call attention to it and thereby disclose his part in the transaction, and it will never be found.

A collector or other customs officer, or a claimant having accounts with the Government, would naturally make the acquaintance of the clerk who has charge of his accounts, as they have in the past, with no thought of fraud or collusion. As the system now stands, there are two officers and two clerks to collude with; but with only one clerk between him and the Government, with no means of detecting carelessness, negligence, or fraud, collusion to a dishonestly inclined person would naturally be suggested.

The provision of the bill seems to be admirably arranged for claimants and delinquents, but directly adverse to the interests of the Government. The Auditor's decisions are to be final in all cases not appealed. An appeal to the First Comptroller is provided for in the bill, but no decision in favor of a claimant or delinquent would ever be appealed, and the Auditor would not appeal from his own decision, and no one else would know anything about it, and there would be no protection for the Government.

The certificate of the Auditor would disclose no question of law or fact, and the Secretary of the Treasury and the First Comptroller would have no knowledge of the questions passed upon in the examination of a claim or account thus passed by the Auditor, whatever might be allowed. But every decision against a claimant could be appealed to the First Comptroller and tried over again.

But under some extraordinary circumstances, if the Comptroller should discover that an illegal allowance had been made by the Auditor and should take an appeal and decide against the claimant, such action would be of doubtful avail. When the allowance was made the claimant would promptly secure payment, and it would be very doubtful if the money could be recovered back upon a subsequent disallowance by the Comptroller. A suit would have to be instituted against the claimant, and even if a judgment should be obtained in many cases it would be impossible to collect the money.

It does not seem to be a very wise policy to pay the claimant first and then try to get the money back afterward.

Where such multiplex and enormous personal interests are at stake, would it be wise to abolish this safeguard of the Treasury? The value of a second examination for the purpose of preventing fraud and collusion can not be doubted. In said Report No. 409, page 5, the experts state that of 500 accounts revised by the Commissioner of Customs' Office, covering a period of two months, and aggregating a total amount involved of $48,022,523.33, it was found that the results of these accounts were not changed, with but one error found, etc. Now, does this not prove the efficiency and preventive nature of the system and the fidelity of the clerks and those rendering the accounts, as well as the efficiency of the clerks? In a healthy condition of the present system, would not this result be precisely what should be expected? Because there has been no attempt for a long time to burglarize the United States Treasury, would it be wise to abolish the watchmen, the safeguards of the building, and thereby economize the money paid to them for salaries? It would undoubtedly simplify matters, but would it be safe?

Following the line of argument of the Joint Commission, it might be suggested that there is no necessity for the revision of the bills passed by the House of Representatives, and hence the Senate is unnecessary and extravagant; in fact, there are not wanting advocates of a single legislative body in this country and in Europe.

Is there safety in ill-considered haste to change an accounting system which our fathers in their wisdom established, and which has had the approval of wise Secretaries of the Treasury?

Experience has shown that there is wisdom in revision.

The greater portion of all questions of law which are raised and decided in the statement of accounts is the work of the revising offices. Emphatically so as to the office of Commissioner of Customs; and while the amount of money may sometimes be small, the decision of the question of law in the case may prevent future payments of magnitude or prevent the misapplication of appropriations and erroneous interpretation of laws. The usefulness of these decisions can not be measured in terms of money; they must be measured by right and justice and good government. They prevent unauthorized violations of law which would otherwise demoralize the public service.

This revising office has established a long list of admirable decisions, compared to which the auditing office can show little in value. The attention of the clerks in the Auditor's office is directed especially to the collection of evidence and to a formal statement of the accounts, while the Commissioner of Customs is concerned in the question whether the facts presented by the Auditor are in accordance with the law, hence the revising offices have developed a more highly trained judgment in the construction and application of statutes, which is the highest function of the present accounting system. It is proposed that collectors should forward all original papers pertaining to entries, including original invoices with appraisers' returns noted thereon, and the returns of the weigher and gauger to the Auditor. In the report of the joint committee it is stated that—

"The purpose of the bill is not only to reduce expenditures, but is to effect an efficient audit and active supervision of the customs accounts by the First Auditor of the Treasury, to prevent unnecessary duplication of work, and to expedite public business."

As to the first purpose of the bill to reduce expenditures, it will be found that to examine the original invoices from the collectors would require the employment of experts and translators in the Auditor's office. Frequently the goods imported have to be examined at the ports of entry, thus necessitating a continuance of experts and translators there also. This, with the additional labor involved upon the First Auditor's office, consisting of the work now performed by the Commissioner of Custom's office, and with which the Auditor has now no connection, would cost the Government more money than the present system. Therefore a reduction of expenditures would not be accomplished.

As to the second purpose of this bill, viz: "To effect an efficient audit and active supervision of the customs accounts."

I wish to call special attention to the statement contained in the report of the Joint Commission, page 1, viz.:

"* * * About 90 per cent of the customs receipts come from offices where there are naval officers, and the Auditor has no original papers wherewith to check the transcript of the accounts which is forwarded to him by the collector and certified as correct by the naval officer. For the other ports, where there are no naval officers, the accounts of the collectors are accompanied by a copy of the merchant's entries.

Now, these naval officers represent the Treasury Department, and it is their duty to make original investigation of manifests, invoices, and entries of goods imported, and to estimate the duties, independently of the collector and before the duties are paid; and after duties are paid it is their further duty to examine the collector's accounts and abstracts and to certify to their correctness. (Customs Regulations, 1892, articles 1040-1042.)

The report of the Joint Committee further says, on page 1:

"It is proposed that for all ports, except New York, the collectors shall forward to the Auditor, with their statement of accounts, original consular invoices with the appraisers' returns noted thereon, and the returns of the weigher and gauger, if any. This will give the Auditor the facilities for making a complete and satisfactory audit of the customs officers accounts."

Over 76 per cent of the 90 per cent of customs receipts at the ports referred to are now collected at the excepted port of New York, and according to the above propositions the accounts covering less than 24 per cent of those receipts will go to the Auditor, on which a complete and satisfactory audit can be made.

The examination of these papers by the Auditor would be a duplication of work, which can not be done so efficiently by the Auditor as by the naval officers; and it would not be wise to abolish the naval officers, as the investigations made by these officers, who are agents of the Treasury Department, are made before the duties are paid, and errors made by the collectors in estimating the duties and liquidating the entries can be corrected in time to secure the proper duties. The naval officer is there where all the transaction takes place, and can investigate and adjust every step of the proceeding which may be unsatistactory. The First Auditor could not make such investigation and adjustment; he could only review the papers after the duties were collected and the transaction closed. If, after liquidation and accounts rendered, the Auditor should discover that an error in the rate of duty had been made he would be helpless to correct it. (Heyl's Digest, 1891, Customs Administration; act of 1890, section 14, page 115; 26 Statutes at Large, section 14, page 131.)

To supplant the simultaneous investigation of transactions before they are completed by an officer of the Treasury Department who is present and can see what is being done by an examination at a distance of papers representing these transactions hardly seems to be an improvement of methods.

Collectors of customs are chargeable only with the amount of duties collected, and any additional charge by the Auditor founded on the examination of those papers would be illegal.

Notwithstanding these facts it is proposed to adopt the above method, so valueless. The report of the Joint Commission, No. 409, on page 1, says:

"It is proposed to give the First Auditor in Washington more facilities for obtaining an accurate check upon accounts of collectors, and this will protect the Government to a much greater degree than it is now protected by the office of the Commissioner of Customs." * * *

Suppose those papers would be of some value to the accounting officers, why not require them to be furnished under the existing system, without destroying much more valuable safeguards. The Secretary of the Treasury has now, and always has had, authority to require that all necessary papers be furnished with accounts to the Treasury Department. The Treasury regulations of 1892, section 887, require that the liquidated duties shall be certified on the entry by the proper officer.

If the work of the office of Commissioner of Customs is an unnecessary duplication, what a commentary it is on the auditing system of the Government which has prevailed since the days of Hamilton, and what a commentary on the wisdom of the great Secretary of the Treasury, Robert J. Walker, who recommended the establishment of this office, and what a commentary on the Congress which created it.

It is respectfully suggested that the United States Senate should stand true to its traditions and dignity, and whatever action is taken should be done with thoughtful and careful consideration, and with a full knowledge of all the facts in the matter.

ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION ON ACCOUNTS.

On July 17, 1862, Congress provided, in "An act to provide for the more prompt settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers" (12 Stat., 593), that from and after that date any officer or agent of the United States who should receive public money which he was not authorized to retain as salary, pay, or emolument, should render his accounts monthly, instead of quarterly, as theretofore, and that such accounts, with the vouchers necessary to the correct and prompt settlement thereof, should be rendered direct to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, and be mailed or otherwise forwarded to their proper address within ten days after the expiration of each successive month.

At the same time Congress also provided that in case of the nonreceipt at the Treasury of any accounts within a reasonable and proper time thereafter, the officer whose accounts were in default should be required to furnish satisfactory evidence of having complied with the above provision, and that for any default on his part the delinquent officer should be deemed a defaulter, and be subject to all the penalties prescribed by the sixteenth section of the act of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat., 63), "to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenues," that is to say, the penalties prescribed by section 5491 of the Revised Statutes, which are a fine equal to the amount of the money involved or embezzled, and imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than ten years.

It thus appears that in July, 1862, early in the war of the rebellion, Congress dispensed with such administrative action or examination as was then had upon the accounts of disbursing officers and provided that their accounts should be rendered direct to the proper Auditor of the Treasury. The object of this legislation, as expressed in the title of the act, was "to provide for the more prompt settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers." So far as the accounts of disbursing officers of the War and Navy Departments were concerned, who were disbursing vast amounts of money appropriated by Congress for the suppression of the rebellion, and who were for the most part inexperienced in their duties as disbursing officers, there would seem to have been the greatest necessity, thus early in the history of the war, for administrative action or examination by the War and Navy Departments.

But Congress thought otherwise. Desiring to secure a more prompt settlement of these and other accounts of disbursing officers, it enacted such measures as in its wisdom were necessary to secure that object. All accounts were to be rendered monthly instead of quarterly, were to be forwarded to the Treasury within ten days of the expiration of each successive month or the delinquent disbursing officer to be deemed a defaulter and to be subject to the severe penalties prescribed by statute for embezzlement of the public funds, and all administrative action or examination upon the accounts was to be dispensed with and the accounts, with the vouchers necessary to the correct and prompt settlement thereof, to be forwarded direct to the proper Auditor for the action of the accounting officers of the Treasury.

In the aforesaid act Congress provided, however, that the Secretary of the Treasury might, if in his opinion the circumstances of the case justified and required it, extend the time therein before prescribed for the rendition of accounts, and also that nothing contained in the act should be construed to restrain the heads of any of the Executive Departments from requiring such other returns or reports from the disbursing officer or agent, subject to the control of such heads of Departments, as the public interests might require. (See the act of July 17, 1862, chapter 199, 12 Stat., 593, 594, and section 3622 of the Revised Statutes.)

On March 2, 1867, nearly five years after the passage of the act dispensing with administrative action or examination upon the accounts of disbursing officers, and after most of the large accounts of disbursements for the suppression of the rebellion had been rendered direct to the proper auditors of the Treasury, the passage of a joint resolution of Congress was secured, whereby so much of the aforesaid act of July 17, 1862, as provided that "such accounts with the vouchers necessary to the correct and prompt settlement thereof, shall be rendered direct to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury" was repealed, and it was provided that all such accounts and vouchers should thereafter be sent to the bureau to which they pertained, and, after examination there, should be passed to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury for settlement. (See joint resolution No. 48, approved March 2, 1867, 14 Stat., 571, 572, and section 3622 of the Revised Statutes.)

It thus appears that nearly two years after the close of the war of the rebellion, when apparently there was least need for administrative action upon the accounts of disbursing officers, provision was again made for such action or examination by the bureaus to which the accounts respectively pertain.

On July 15, 1870, Congress provided that the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, should not be construed to apply to disbursing officers of the Navy, but that such officers should render their accounts as the same were rendered before the passage of said joint resolution; that is to say, direct to the Fourth Auditor for his action and the action of the Second Comptroller, without administrative action or examination, which provision of law is still in force. (See section 15 of the act of July 15, 1870, 16 Stat., 334, and section 3622 of the Revised Statutes.)

It thus appears that the accounts of disbursing officers of the Navy, after being exempt from administrative action or examination by the bureaus of the Navy Department for a period of nearly five years, were made subject to such action or examination after the war of the rebellion for a period of little more than three years, whereupon they were again made exempt therefrom, and have continued so for nearly a quarter of a century.

If administrative action or examination by the bureaus of the War Department is necessary upon the accounts of disbursing officers of the Army, it is not apparent why such action or examination by the bureaus of the Navy Department is not necessary upon the accounts of disbursing officers of the Navy. Nor is it apparent if such action or examination is unnecessary upon the accounts of disbursing officers of the Navy, why it is necessary upon the accounts of officers of the Army.

If it was unnecessary in time of a great war, when there were thousands of inexperienced disbursing officers with inexperienced clerks in the service, it would certainly seem to be unnecessary in time of peace. If a more prompt settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers is desired than that which now obtains, a return to the remedy prescribed in the act of July 17, 1862, might and doubtless would be found sufficiently effective. That remedy, as has been shown, was the requirement that administrative action or examination should be dispensed with and accounts forwarded direct to the proper Auditor of the Treasury for the action of the accounting officers. The statute then required, as the act of August 30, 1890 (26 Stat., 413), does now, the quarterly rendition of accounts of disbursing officers.

Something in the direction of a more prompt settlement of accounts might be gained by providing for their monthly rendition in all cases, as was done in the act of July 17, 1862. But still more would be gained in that direction by dispensing with administrative action or examination upon the accounts of disbursing officers by the bureaus of the Executive Departments in which the accounts respectively accrue, as was done in the act of July 17, 1862, so far as all accounts were concerned, and as was done again in the act of July 15, 1870, so far as all naval accounts are concerned.

If these suggestions should be carried into effect, all accounts of disbursing officers of the Army would still be subject to the examination prescribed by the act of April 20, 1874 (18 Stat., 33). That act makes it the duty of the Secretary of War to cause frequent inquiries to be made as to the necessity, economy, and propriety of all disbursements made by disbursing officers of the Army, and as to their strict conformity to the law appropriating the money. It also makes it his duty to ascertain whether the disbursing officers of the Army comply with the law in keeping their accounts and making their deposits. It directs that all these inquiries shall be made by officers of the inspection department of the Army or others detailed for that purpose.

By that designation is meant the Inspector-General's Department of the Army. It provides, however, that no officer detailed for the purpose of making the inquiries contemplated by the act shall be in any way connected with the department or corps making the disbursement. It also provides that the reports of such inspections shall be made out and forwarded to Congress with the annual report of the Secretary of War.

It would seem that these examinations or inspections, if promptly and faithfully made, should be sufficient as preliminary examinations by the War Department, that is, as examinations preliminary to the passing of the accounts to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury for a full and detailed examination by them.

[In connection with Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 145, Fifty-third Congress, second session.]

Supplemental statement in relation to Senate bill No. 1831, identical with House bill No. 6478, introduced March 29, 1894. Prepared by J. R. Garrison, late Deputy First Comptroller of the Treasury.

TRANSFER OF FILES AND RECORDS IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WHICH THE PROPOSED CHANGE WILL NECESSITATE.

Section 6 of the bill, lines 35-37, provides that "the Auditors shall, under the direction of the Comptroller of the Treasury preserve with their vouchers and certificates all accounts which have been finally adjusted."

In order to carry out the proposed change it will be necessary, as stated by the experts, "that the Register's jurisdiction of the files shall be transferred to the Auditors to whom the accounts relate," to "transfer to the respective Auditors jurisdiction of the files now under the Register." (House Report No. 637, Fifty-third Congress, second session, pages 21 and 29.)

To fully comprehend the magnitude of the work that such transfer of the files will require, some particularity of statement is necessary.

The Register of the Treasury is now the official bookkeeper of all civil accounts, and the custodian of the files and records of such accounts. Down to 1817, he was the bookkeeper of all accounts settled by the accounting officers and the custodian of all the files. By section 5 of the act of March 3, 1817 (3 Stat., 366), the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditors (whose offices were created by said act) were authorized to record and register the accounts made subject to their jurisdiction respectively, and to keep the files and records thereof.

This departure from the Hamiltonian system of accounting is the prime cause of the confusion and perplexity upon which so much stress is laid by the experts and the honorable commission.

Had the Register's jurisdiction been preserved intact, in his office would have been the registers and records of all accounts and the files thereof. So that there would have been one central office in which the recorded balances of all accounts might be found, and the tracing of the payment of any account or claim, or the indebtedness of an officer on any and all accounts, would have been easy and simple.

The necessity of having the Register of the Treasury keep the balances of all accounts and the files thereof has been adverted to in annual reports by some of the First Comptrollers. The proposed change takes from the Register his duties as official bookkeeper and custodian of the files of civil accounts, transfers the bookkeeping to a division in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and divides the files of accounts between the several Auditors. Should the proposed legislation become a law the result will be that for information as to all receipts, and respecting civil expenditures (other than receipts and expenditures of the postal service), the Register's records and files must be resorted to from the establishment of the Department down to the time the proposed legislation is to go into effect, but after that time it will be necessary to have recourse to the bookkeeping division of the Secretary's office and the files kept by each of the six Auditors.

With respect to military and naval expenditures the search for information will be more complex still. From the organization of the Department down to 1817 we would look to the Register's records and files; after 1817 to the records and files of the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditors, but after the proposed legislation goes into effect (if enacted into a law) we must turn to the bookkeeping division of the Secretary's Office and the files kept by each of the six Auditors. The records and files of postal receipts and expenditures have been kept in the Sixth Auditor's Office since its establishment in 1836.

In addition to the foregoing we must also take into consideration that the jurisdiction of each of the six Auditors (excepting the Auditor for the Post-Office Department) will be very materially changed, causing changes in the serial numbers of many classes of accounts, which will pass from the jurisdiction of one Auditor to that of another, e. g., internal-revenue accounts which have been under the Fifth Auditor since the internal-revenue system was inaugurated will go to the First Auditor; judiciary accounts and accounts relating to the Department of Agriculture, which have always been under the First Auditor, will go to the Fifth Auditor; civil expenditures of the War and Navy Departments, which have heretofore been under the First Auditor, will be transferred to the Second and Fourth Auditors; all expenditures of the Interior Department heretofore audited by the First Auditor, will pass to the Third Auditor, who will also take jurisdiction of the public land accounts now audited by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and so on.

To state the foregoing facts is to demonstrate that the changes proposed, if carried out, will multiply confusion and perplexity, instead of simplifying the existing methods; so that, after the lapse of a number of years, when the officials and clerks now on the scene of action shall have passed away, it will be a matter of the greatest difficulty to trace payments and hunt up the information that is so frequently required respecting accounts and claims. There being no statute of limitation, the liability of paying old claims a second time will be increased because of the difficulty of tracing out former payments.

The necessary transfers to be made in the files, to place them under the changed jurisdiction of the several Auditors, as above partially indicated, will require much time and patient labor by skilled clerks.

In the Register's Office there are now three large files rooms, occupying much space, two located in the basement of the Treasury Department and one in the attic story, in which story is also located the files rooms of the Third and Fourth Auditors. The files of the Second Auditor are in the Winder Building, corner of Seventeenth and F streets northwest.

There is little more available space for files in the Treasury building, which has been burdened with the vast accumulation for a number of years. During President Cleveland's first Administration, Secretary Fairchild forcibly brought the matter to the attention of Congress, and urged that a hall of records for the uncurrent files and records of the Treasury Department and other Executive Departments be provided. In the near future it will become absolutely necessary to provide a building for the uncurrent files and records of the Treasury Department.

The honorable Commission and the experts seemed to have overlooked this necessity altogether, and probably they did not fully investigate and consider the actual condition of things and contemplate what a heavy undertaking it will be, attended with great expense and much labor, besides the inevitable confusion and perplexity already adverted to, to transfer the files and records of the Register's office—the accumulation of more than a century—to the jurisdiction of the several Auditors. If the simplifying of methods is sought for it would seem the proper course to restore all the files to the custody of the Register and to make him the official bookkeeper of all classes of accounts. The Register is an independent officer of the Department, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the propriety of certifying accounts to him, to be registered and recorded, rather than to a chief of division appointed by the Secretary, is manifest.

Hamilton spoke of the Register as exercising an important check upon the Secretary and the Comptroller with respect to warrants, and upon the Auditor and Comptroller in recording and registering the accounts passed by them. (Works of Hamilton, volume 5, page 77.) The Register also exercises an important check in keeping the files of accounts, and should therefore be the custodian instead of the Auditors. When an account is withdrawn from the Register's files a receipt therefor is taken, so that the party withdrawing it is known, and could always be detected should he destroy or lose an account so withdrawn, or any part thereof. But where an Auditor is given the sole power of passing upon an account or claim, as is proposed in the bills referred to, and is also made the custodian of the files of the accounts passed by him, the check against the allowance of an illegal or fraudulent account or claim is not only removed, but the custody of such account being under the Auditor and not under a separate officer, it is made much easier to make away with an account or claim which furnishes evidence of guilty action by a clerk or an official of the Auditor's office.

ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION OR APPROVAL OF AN ACCOUNT OR CLAIM NOT AN AUDIT.

So much weight is given by the honorable Commission and the experts of the so-called administrative action or approval by the Executive Departments and other offices, that more particularity seems to be required to show that this view is erroneous.

The Commission quote extensively from the report of Hon. Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, made in 1834, as in support of their views respecting the accounting system of the Department; but they have overlooked or intentionally omitted this very significant statement, taken from said report:

"It is manifest that no effectual check can ever exist in any case where the same officer authorizes the expenditure and audits or controls the audit of accounts." (Senate Document No. 16, page 5, second session Twenty-third Congress.)

Of what value is the administrative action or approval by the head of the Department who authorizes the expenditure, in the light of Mr. Woodbury's opinion?

To illustrate how perfunctory is the approval of the heads of Departments, it may be stated as a fact that some of the Secretaries of War, and perhaps the heads of other Departments, when it was decided that the affixing of their signatures by a stamp to the accounts or vouchers to be approved would not be accepted, caused schedules of the vouchers to be made to which their signature could be appended. And yet the experts, evidently without correct information as to the facts, say:

"The safeguards or checks upon the disbursing officers rest almost entirely with the heads of the Executive Departments under which the disbursements are made." "The double detailed examinations in the Treasury Department are unnecessary, as the administrative officers keep as close a supervision over, and make as careful examination of, their expenditures as was originally done by the Auditor at the foundation of the Government."

This statement is not borne out by the facts; and even if it were strictly correct, the examination by the administrative officers who authorize the expenditures is, in the words of Mr. Woodbury, "no effectual check."

It is respectfully suggested that the so-called administrative action in a number of bureaus connected with the Treasury and other Departments might be more safely dispensed with and a greater saving and prompter dispatch of the public business effected thereby than to strike down the office of Comptroller in the accounting system of the Treasury. This administrative action is of no value to the accounting officers, and is productive of much of the delay in the settlement of accounts, so justly complained of. A half dozen or more bureaus, offices, or divisions under the Treasury Department might be named in which are so-called accounting offices or divisions devoted to the administrative action of accounts before they come before the Auditors and the First Comptroller. The same condition of things exists in most of the other Executive Departments, and with respect to accounts under the jurisdiction of the Second Comptroller as well as the First Comptroller.

PRACTICAL ILLUSTRATION OF THE IMPORTANCE OF A DOUBLE AUDIT OR DIVIDED RESPONSIBILITY IN THE SETTLEMENT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

In the report accompanying the bills introduced on March 29 no attention is paid to the great importance of a rigorous and thorough audit of revenue accounts, the argument being devoted solely to expenditures, it being claimed that the preliminary examination by disbursing officers of their own accounts, and the administrative action in the Executive Departments, afford a sufficient check to warrant dispensing with the detailed examination by the Comptroller. But it is just in revenue accounts where the chance for collusion and fraud is the best. Under the proposed change such accounts will be examined only in the Auditor's Office.

If an officer who receives and collects revenues is dishonest, and he can find a dishonest clerk in the Auditor's Office who examines his accounts, a collusion can be effected between them, with no check upon it in the Department. The officer may arrange to render his returns short, say, by systematic errors in addition, adroitly scattered over the many pages of the returns; the dishonest clerk for a corrupt motive may agree to pass the shortages unnoticed. The Auditor can not examine into all these details; no one but the clerk who handles the accounts does. And so a false account might be audited from year to year without detection.

Much is said in the report of the experts to show that it is unnecessary for the Comptroller's Office to review or revise figures, or mathematical computations, but the foregoing illustration will show that it is just here where lurking frauds are most likely to occur.

In the report on the bill introduced March 6, and passed by the House March 8, to abolish the office of Commissioner of Customs (Senate bill No. 1738, House bill No. 5750), it is suggested that as 90 per cent of the customs revenues are collected at ports where there are naval officers, the preliminary examination by the naval officers may be taken as sufficient to dispense with the examination in the office of Commissioner of Customs. Great importance is attached to the fact that section 5 of the proposed bill provides that it shall be the duty of collectors of customs, under direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to furnish with their accounts the original papers upon which the abstracts of the duties collected are made up by the naval officers.

This was one of the inducements set out for passing this bill, dispensing with the office of Commissioner of Customs, it being alleged that the original papers alluded to will greatly strengthen the audit of the Auditor. It was strangely overlooked by the honorable Commission and the experts that existing law, sections 248 and 251, Revised Statutes, gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the most ample and complete power to require by regulation that such original papers shall be forwarded with the accounts of collectors.

The preliminary work of naval officers can not safely take the place of the detailed examination in the Comptroller's office (or that of the Commissioner of Customs). It was never intended for that purpose. For the duties of naval officers see sections 2626, 2869, and 2889, United States Revised Statutes; sections 1040 and 1042 of the Customs Regulations of 1892. See also customs administrative act of June 10, 1890, 26 United States Statutes at Large, pages 131-137, which makes the decision of collectors of customs as to the rate and amount chargeable upon imported merchandise final and conclusive against parties in interest, subject to appeal, under the conditions prescribed, to the board of United States general appraisers and thence to the United States circuit courts.

After the star-route frauds had been perpetrated, Hon. Jacob H. Ela, of New Hampshire, for many years a member of Congress from that State, and afterwards Fifth Auditor of the Treasury for a number of years, was selected for his special fitness and tried integrity to be Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, to which position he was transferred and appointed from that of Fifth Auditor. In a letter addressed by him to Hon. William Lawrence, then First Comptroller of the Treasury, under date of May 8, 1884, he says:

"In answer to your inquiry as to 'whether it is advisable to apply the Treasury system of adjusting accounts to the account of the Post-Office Department,' I have the honor to inform you that I favor the policy of having all accounts reviewed by a Comptroller after passing an Auditor, whenever they shall be reduced to the lowest practicable number. At the present time four-fifths of the accounts of postmasters are such that they could be dispensed with, by causing the money-order offices to disburse such payments as become necessary, and furnish such stamps as may be required at the smaller offices."

From Mr. Ela's long experience in public life, and the fact that he had served as an Auditor subject to review by the Comptroller, and afterwards as Sixth Auditor, who exercises the functions both of Auditor and Comptroller, and the great interest in the proper settlement of public accounts which existed at the time because of Star Route frauds, great weight should be given to his opinion in favor of the final review of all accounts by the Comptroller.

Public men of ability have entertained the opinion that the Star Route frauds could not have been successfully perpetrated had these accounts been subject to a detailed examination in the Comptroller's office, since the question as to the legality of said accounts would have been developed thereby and presented for final decision by the Comptroller.

DUTIES OF THE COMPTROLLER UNDER THE PROPOSED LAW.

Under the proposed legislation it would seem that there is no duty appertaining to the office of Comptroller of the Treasury, as therein provided for, which may not at any time be devolved upon his assistant or chief clerk, although the Comptroller is present.

"The Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Treasury, and shall have power, under the direction of the Comptroller of the Treasury, to countersign all warrants and sign all other papers." (Section 2, lines 19 to 23.)

Thus the Assistant Comptroller may at any time countersign accountable warrants, under direction of the Comptroller, a class of warrants which, under the law, must be signed by the Secretary himself, when present and in discharge of his official duties, and which can only be signed by an Assistant Secretary as Acting Secretary when the Secretary is absent, and in like manner must be countersigned bp the First Comptroller when present, and by the Acting Comptroller in his absence.

"The chief clerk shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the Comptroller, and thall have the power, in the name of the Comptroller of the Treasury, to countersign all warrants except accountable warrants." (Setcion 2, lines 24 to 27.)

This broad authority as to the assignument of duties to the Assistant Comptroller and the chief clerk makes it possible for the office of Comptroller of the Treasury to become a sinecure.

TREASURY SYSTEM UNDER THE CONFEDERATION.

An interesting review of the Treasury system under the Confederation may be found in volume 6 of the Decisions of Comptroller Lawrence, pages 263 to 266.

Although the plan of accounting under the Confederation was several times changed, yet as early as September 25, 1778, the following ordinance was passed (Journals of Congress, volume 3, page 70 et seq.; Laws United States, edition 1815, volume 1, page 663):

"Resolved, That a house be provided, at the city or place where Congress shall sit, wherein shall be held the several offices of the Treasury;

"That there be the following offices, to wit, the Comptroller's, Auditor's, Treasurer's, and two chambers of accounts;

"That each chamber of accounts consists of three commissioners and two clerks to be appointed by Congress;

"That in the Auditor's office there be an Auditor annually appointed by Congress, and two clerks appointed by the Auditor;

"That in the Comptroller's office there be a Comptroller annually appointed by Congress and two clerks appointed by the Comptroller;

"That the Auditor, Comptroller, and Treasurer shall not be appointed unless by the votes of nine States, and they be accountable for the conduct of their clerks respectively."

The succeeding sections of the ordinance directed the Auditor to recieve all claims against the United States, and refer them to one of the chambers of accounts, the Commissioner of which was to turn them over to his clerks for a careful examination. The accounts were then to be transmitted to the Auditor, with the findings of the Commissioner indorsed upon them. The ordnance required that—

"The Auditor shall receive the vouchers and accounts from the Commissioners to whom he referred them, and cause them to be examined by his clerk * * * andafter careful examination of the accounts as aforesaid, he * * * shall transmit the accounts and vouchers to the Comptroller"—who had the final action thereon.

In this early stage, when the business of the Government under the Confederation was so limited that two clerks in the Auditor's office and two in the Comptroller's office were sufficient to pass upon all of the accounts, the divided responsibility in the accounting system was recognized, and the accounts practically received three examinations; first by the clerks in the Commissioner's office; next by those in the Auditor's office, and finally by those in the Comptroller's office.

This scheme of accounting, under the ordinance of September 26, 1778, corresponds in very many respects with the Treasury system of to-day, as established by the organic act of September 2, 1789.

The reports ordered to be inserted in the RECORD at the request of Mr. COCKRELL are as follows:

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Joint Commission of Congress to Inquire into the Status of Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 1831):

The Joint Commission of Congress to Inquire into the Status of Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1831) to improve the methods of accounting in the Treasury Department, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it back herewith and recommend its passage.

The bill in general provides for a reorganization of the present accounting system of the Treasury Department. It has been examined and is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury in a letter submitted herewith.

The system was originally devised and projected on the organization of the Government, with special reference to the adjudication of claims, which then constituted the preponderating part of accounts, and for the business of the Government as it then existed, when there was no preliminary examination of accounts by administrative or disbursing officers. It appears to have been well adapted for the purpose for which it was designed.

The Treasury Department then contained a Secretary, Comptroller, Auditor, Treasurer, and Register. Of these, the only officers to which were assigned accounting were the Comptroller and the Auditor. The Secretary superintended the business of the Department, including the collection of revenue, and granted warrants countersigned by the Comptroller for the payment of money, but no authority was given him to adjust or decide upon accounts. The Treasurer was himself an accountable officer, and had no authority to pass on the accounts of others. The Register had no authority over either payments or settlements, but simply kept the books of account, and registered the settlements and payments made. The heads of the Executive Departments did not first pass upon accounts, and there was no general system of disbursing by disbursing officers as now.

This plan seemed well enough adapted to the transaction of the comparatively small business of the Government as then conducted. There was but a single revision of the accounts instead of practically two as now, and no unnecessary delay was occasioned in the dispatch of the public business.

The advisability of having a Register to simply keep the books and preserve the accounts may be doubted, as that function could have been performed as well either by the Secretary or the Comptroller. The value of the function of the Register seems to have been doubted, when, in establishing the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditors in 1817, they were authorized to keep their own books and preserve their accounts.

If, under the immense business that now takes place in the Government, the same simplicity of details could be followed as was originally intended, no reorganization of the Department might be necessary. If all demands on the Government could be presented direct to the Auditors, and they could be passed upon and put in shape for payment and be revised only once, then paid, and the books of account for all kept in one Department, the original plan might work properly for the present business; but this is impracticable, as the expenditures of the Government have become so great that it has been found necessary to make payments under the heads of the various Executive Departments.

To facilitate such business the act of January 31, 1823, was passed, allowing advances to be made to disbursing officers. Other changes, also, hereinafter referred to, have become necessary. The Government has now become such a vast machine that its requirements are very carefully provided for by Congress. The appropriations are made with minute detail, and it only remains to see that the money which is appropriated for the various Departments is paid out according to the intentions of Congress.

The accounts now, in most cases, have three and sometimes four examinations; that of the disbursing officer, as to 90 per cent of the business; that of the Executive Department, that of the Auditor, and that of the Comptroller—the examinations by the Executive Department not having existed when the present system was originally established—and that by disbursing agents to a comparatively small extent. This triple and in many cases quadruple examination—two more examinations than existed originally—causes great delay, and it is questionable whether the examinations are not more loosely conducted than if there was more responsibility placed upon one of the examinations. The object of having the two examinations by the Auditor and the Comptroller is to detect and prevent frauds; but in studying the matter carefully it is questionable whether these double examinations have fulfilled the expectations of their authors, and especially whether they subserved any good purpose after the preliminary administrative examination was added.

In this connection the following paragraphs from a report made to Congress in 1842, by a "select committee on retrenchment," are pertinent:

"Responsibility is rarely increased by multiplying agents to do the same thing. Instead of acting as checks to prevent wrongdoing, too often they promote negligence and fraud by distributing the responsibility for what is done.

"The innovations which have been made in the accounting system have embarrassed the system by making it more complicated without increasing either its efficiency or responsibility. The complex system of expenditure and account is one of the greatest practicable obstructions to economy and responsibility in the Government. The Departments at the seat of the Government, instead of being accessible and intelligible to the people who come from all quarters of the Union with business, are but labyrinths, which often perplex those most experienced in their mazes."

The changes which have been made in the accounting system as originally established show that this system has proved inadequate as the business of the country has increased, and that experience has demonstrated so many examinations unnecessary. First, in the establishment of the General Land Office in 1812 (which was done under the direction and control of Albert Gallatin, one of the greatest Secretaries of the Treasury this country has ever had) and in the establishment of the Interior Department in 1849 the accounts of the General Land Office were by law authorized to be audited and settled in the administrative office, and to pass from there directly to the Comptroller for his decision. Secondly, in the establishment of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department in 1836, his audit was made final and conclusive, and not subject to revision except upon an appeal to the Comptroller.

These cases are in line with the system provided for by this bill, and show the necessity of giving greater facility and expedition in the settlement of accounts, in order to protect the Government. The report to the House in 1842, quoted above, says further:

"A great deal may be done by honest and vigilant officers, even under the worst system, to secure fidelity and economy in disbursements; but it is unwise, as well as unsafe, to continue a defective system of accountability which exposes the public interests to constant danger under the best management.

"The responsibility for disbursements is now distributed among the clerks and heads of three several classes of offices, all of whom examine, and two of whom decide, claims; or, in other words, there are three distinct tiers of offices all employed, in fact, on the same duties. The expense incurred by this multiplication of officers and salaries would constitute no sufficient objection to the present organization, if the guards of the Treasury were multiplied to the same or any extent."

It is clear that the present mode of settling accounts does not answer the demands of public justice or economy; and it also clear that the divided responsibility does not protect the Government.

The aim of the present bill is to place greater responsibility upon the Auditors who are now engaged in auditing accounts; to hold them responsible not only for the settlement of accounts and claims that come to them, but also make them responsible for the advancing of money to disbursing officers, their responsibility in the latter case being that they shall disapprove such requisitions for said officers if they have not complied with the law in the rendering of their accounts.

It is the intention of this bill to lessen the number of agents who now share the responsibility for the auditing of accounts, and to concentrate it where it will be felt and where abuses can be at once detected.

In view of the fact that 90 per cent of the expenditures of Government now pass through disbursing officers who are under bond and take especial care to pay out money only for purposes clearly authorized by law—who, indeed, are authorized to obtain the decisions of the Comptroller as to the construction of statutes before making payments—and who, therefore, primarily satisfy themselves of the correctness of the accounts; and in further view of the fact that the administrative officers also examine and approve these accounts coming under their control before they go to the Auditor, which examination was unknown when the original system of settlement of accounts by an Auditor and revision by a Comptroller was established, it would seem to be entirely unnecessary to have these accounts pass through any further revision as to mere mathematical computations under well-settled laws after the proper Auditor has examined them and ascertained and stated the balances.

This bill, therefore, makes this audit final, except as to decisions involving new constructions of statutes, subject to appeal by the claimant, or by the Comptroller, head of a department, or the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the Government. Thus all the time now required in the Comptroller's Office to repeat the useless revision of mere mathematical computations is saved.

To guard against the possibility of collusion in the settlement of the few classes of claims which have not had a previous examination and approval by an administrative officer, the Auditor is required to submit such claims to two clerks to examine independently, and a favorable report is required from both to settle the same.

Above the six Auditors is placed one Comptroller, with his assistant, to revise the few settlements appealed from the Auditor, but mainly to determine finally the construction of statutes either by revision on the Auditor's report of decisions, or on appeal.

The advantage of having one Comptroller to stand in the same relation to the Auditors as an appellate court to inferior courts, instead of two or (with the Commissioner of Customs) three, as now, to make final decisions as to construction of statutes, is so clear that it requires no argument. As it is now statutes sometimes receive contradictory constructions by the different Comptrollers. Under the system proposed there will be uniform constructions of statutes in the accounting branch of the Government, and the fact that one officer is charged with this judicial duty, and relieved from mere mathematical computations, will be likely to lead to more satisfactory results.

When it is borne in mind that all the material changes in revising accounts by the Comptroller arise from the fact that sometimes the latter officer modifies the Auditor's decisions as to the construction of statutes, it will be seen that the system of accounting proposed by this bill secures revision at the only point where it can possibly subserve the public interests, and dispenses with it in the great body of accounts where nothing but mathematical computations are concerned, and where revision is useless for security and the cause of great delay in the settlement of accounts.

To still further promote expedition in the transaction of public business and increase the security of the Government through a more speedy settlement of the accounts of officials, disbursing and other officers charged with the custody of public money are required to make prompt returns under such provisions as are likely to make the requirement effective.

In addition to simplifying, unifying, and expediting the settlement of public accounts, it is estimated that the bill will effect a reduction of the force in the accounting branches of the Government, and result in an annual saving of about $300,000, and at the same time better protect the public interests.

The following synopsis of the several sections of the bill will more fully explain the proposed plan of accounting:

Section 1 of the bill provides a new nomenclature for the Auditors. The present numbers indicate nothing; and the names as given them in section 1 will indicate the accounts which they audit, and should be a great advantage to anyone having any business with accounts or claims.

Section 2 of the act abolishes the offices of Second Comptroller, Deputy Second Comptroller, and Deputy First Comptroller of the Treasury, and constitutes the First Comptroller as Comptroller of the Treasury, with all the duties and responsibilities and powers that are now appertaining to the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury. This will concentrate in one head all the legal direction in the settlement of accounts, and will prevent the conflict and confusion which arises from the fact of having two Comptrollers with the same powers. Much advantage will be gained by having one head to the accounting branch.

This section also provides for an Assistant Comptroller and a chief clerk, who shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Section 3 of the bill provides that the Comptroller of the Treasury shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, prescribe the forms of keeping and rendering accounts. The present law gives this power to the Secretary of the Treasury, and in some cases to the Comptroller. This section makes all such orders uniform. The same section also provides for the supervision of the Comptroller of the Treasury over the making of returns for fees from consuls and consular agents. These returns are now made under the Secretary of State, and, being accounting, the returns should be made as prescribed by the Comptroller.

Section 4 amends section 271 of the Revised Statutes so as to bring it into conformity with the proposed system without changing the authority vested in the Comptroller.

Section 5 defines the accounts which the various Auditors of the Treasury shall receive and examine. This section is intended to cover all accounts which are now rendered, or any which shall hereafter arise, it being intended that the accounts from the various Executive Departments shall go to the Auditor designated for that Department.

Five of these Auditors have each of them a department over whose accounts they shall have supervision. The remaining Auditor is called the Auditor for the State and other Departments, whose duty is to receive and examine all accounts of salaries and incidental expenses of the offices of the Secretary of State, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of Agriculture, and all accounts relating to independent commissions and boards not under an Executive Department. The jurisdiction of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department is not changed, except that he shall hereafter audit, in addition to what he now audits, the accounts of salaries and incidental expenses of the office of Postmaster-General, which are now audited by the Fifth Auditor through an accidental omission in the law establishing this office.

When the Auditor for the Post-Office Department was established, in 1836, the accounts of the Post-Office Department were then audited by the Fifth Auditor; and in giving the jurisdiction of the Sixth Auditor over the post-office accounts they omitted to give him jurisdiction over the accounts for salaries and incidental expenses of the Post-Office Department, leaving such accounts with the Fifth Auditor. The same power of the Comptroller is extended over the Sixth Auditor as he will have over the others; that is, he can call up any account at any time for revision.

Section 6 provides that the settlement of accounts shall be final and conclusive upon the Executive branch of the Government, except upon an appeal, which appeal can be taken by the person whose account is being settled, by the head of the Executive Department or independent establishment to which the account belongs, or by the Comptroller of the Treasury, within a year. Upon such an appeal being taken, the Comptroller is to audit and settle such account, and his decision shall be final and conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government. It also provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his judgment, suspend payment and direct the re-examination of any account, which re-examination may be had of an account examined by an Auditor when it has not been appealed, or after its examination by the Comptroller when the account has been appealed. This is to provide against any possible accidents of passing an account improperly by reason of not having knowledge of certain facts which might become known after an account had been passed.

This section also provides that an Auditor in passing an account, having occasion to pass upon a construction of a statute which has not already been construed, or in changing the construction of a statute which has already been passed upon, shall send his decision upon such original construction or change of construction to the Comptroller of the Treasury. This clause is intended to provide the opportunity of presenting to the Comptroller, for his decision, all matters of a legal nature or matters of importance, it being the intention of this statute that the audit of the Comptroller, which is now practically the only audit which is had, shall be moved back to the Auditors, they to be clothed with responsibility; and that over them there shall be this jurisdiction of the Comptroller and this provision for an appeal.

The same section also provides that disbursing officers or heads of the Executive Departments may obtain the decision of the Comptroller upon any question involving a payment to be made by them, which will bind the Auditors and the Comptroller in passing upon the account containing such disbursement. This is intended as a measure of relief for disbursing officers, and also to allow the Executive Departments to know what the action of the Comptroller will be before an expense is incurred by them.

Section 7 provides that any laws of the Revised Statutes in force relating to an Auditor of the Treasury may apply to the Auditors as constituted in this bill.

Section 8 provides that all the books of the Government shall be kept in one office, and that office under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The division which is given direction of these books is now the Division of Warrants, Estimates, and Appropriations. They have now the ledger accounts of all appropriations, and also the accounts of the public debt, and bonded railroad companies.

This section provides that the books of account, or personal ledgers, now kept in the Register's Office, and those kept in the offices of the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditors, shall be removed to this division. This will give uniformity in the direction of these personal and general accounts, and will allow the rendering of statements under one head, and that head the Secretary of the Treasury. This should prevent the confusion and conflict in the statements which now exists.

Section 9 provides that every requisition for the advance of money, before being acted upon by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be sent to the proper Auditor for his action, as required by section 10.

Section 10 provides that the Auditor shall withhold his approval unless the accounts are forwarded to the Department at Washington within the time specified, and shall be forwarded by the administrative department to the Auditor within another specified time. It is impossible to make any regulations or rules which will compel the prompt rendering of accounts. It is necessary to make a stringent law. Section 3622 of the Revised Statutes prescribes that accounts shall be rendered within a certain time, but it is not complied with.

Sections 9 and 10 of this act will do more for the protection of the Government than a dozen reëxaminations of accounts. Section 9 also provides that warrants signed by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be countersigned by the Comptroller of the Treasury, and that they shall be accompanied either by the Auditor's certificate of the settlement of an account or by a requisition asking for an advance of money; and provides further that this certificate or requisition shall go to the Treasurer, and from him be sent to the proper Auditor, with the date and amount of the draft issued indorsed thereon.

This completes the circle. The Auditor audits the account. It then passes from the hands of the bookkeeping division to the Secretary of the Treasury, and through the Comptroller's Office to the Treasurer, and then comes back to the Auditor with the amount and date of the payment noted. It is evidence to him that the proper amount has been paid as audited, in the case of a settlement; or that an advance has been made in accordance with the requisition. In the settlement of accounts, the Auditor will get from the bookkeeper a statement of the officer's account. He will then have on hand in his own office the requisition asking for the advance, which will be a check upon the bookkeeper.

Section 11 provides that the accounts of all district attorneys, marshals, etc., shall be sent to the Department of Justice before going to the Auditor. These are very unsatisfactory accounts, and it seems wise to have the Attorney-General or his assistants to supervise them before they reach the Auditor. Section 368 of the Revised Statutes now provides that the Attorney-General shall supervise them, but as he does not have the accounts, nor, in fact, ever see them, as by the present law they are sent direct to the Auditor, it is very questionable as to what extent his supervision can go.

Section 11 will give him the power of having proper supervision over these accounts as the law now contemplates. The same section also provides that the judges shall be paid monthly by the disbursing officer of the Department of Justice. It is proposed that this shall be done with a pay roll properly certified. This will save a great many separate statements going through the accounting officer to the Treasury, and will be a more prompt means of paying the judges.

Section 12 provides that claims which come direct to the Auditors from the claimants shall be examined by two divisions in the Auditor's office to which they go. This will provide against any possible opportunity for collusion or carelessness. These claims are not very numerous in class, and this provision can be very readily carried out.

Section 13 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall render to Congress on the first day of the regular session each year an annual combined statement of the receipts and expenditures of all public money, to include those of the Post-Office Department. There is a statement similar to this rendered informally by a division of the Secretary's Office. This statement is of more use to Congress than any other which is rendered, and it is proposed to make this a regular report and include the Post-Office Department.

Section 14 relates to the payment of an outstanding liability, and simply amends the statutes so as to provide that the certificate in such case shall be signed by the Secretary of the Treasury instead of the Register of the Treasury, for the reason that this act transfers the records to the division of bookkeeping and warrants.

Section 15 provides for the certification of books and proceedings which may be required in any suit at law.

Section 16 provides that all contracts relating to the payment or advance of money shall be deposited promptly in the offices of the Auditors of the Treasury. Such contracts are now filed with the Comptrollers. The Auditors have now to borrow contracts from the Comptrollers when they have occasion to use them in settling accounts. It is proposed by this section that they shall be filed where they are needed.

Section 17 provides for the settlement of accounts which may be in the offices of the Comptrollers on the first day of July, 1894, when this law is intended to go into effect.

The bill (H. R. 5750) reported by this commission and passed by the House abolishes the Commissioner of Customs, and provides a proper check or audit on the customs receipts. This bill provides proper protection for the Government in all other of its accounts.

So much inconvenience and delay have arisen from the existing accounting system that various attempts have been made to simplify and make more efficient the accounting department of the Government, and to this end reports have been made to Congress showing the necessity which has appeared for such improvements. We quote as follows:

"Report of Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, made to the Senate December 8, 1834, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 8th of May, 1832, which resolution was as follows:

"'Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a plan for the reorganization of the Treasury Department, with a view to simplifying the forms of settling and keeping accounts, and of rendering them more intelligible; of a more equal distribution of the labor and duties, and abolishing some of the subordinate branches, and reducing the number of clerks in the Executive Department.

"'AUDITORS.

"'The present five Auditors are probably numerous enough for all fiscal purposes; but their respective titles by numbers and the manner of assigning duties to them are not calculated in all cases to make those duties well understood by the public or to be free from complexity, and an appropriate mixture in one bureau of subjects totally unlike. The term "Auditors," as showing to the public that they are the officers to first hear or to examine the evidence and state the results on the accounts or claims of all individuals against the Government for settlement, is sufficiently significant.

"'But the designation of the different Auditors merely by their number conveys no information as to the particular Department with which each is associated or the particular subjects for hearing and examination which are devolved on each. It is therefore recommended that their designation by numbers be changed, and the duties assigned to each be more simplified and rendered more intelligible, by a new division of them, in part, and by attaching one of these officers, and one only, to each Department.'

"Document No. 71, which is a report made by P. G. Washington to the Twenty-fourth Congress, second session, January 6, 1837, entitled 'An inquiry into the practicability of simplifying the system of public accounts,' contains the following:

"'The complexity of the public accounts is a matter of general remark, and all who examine the subject must concur in the President's opinion that the system requires a general reform. There is undoubtedly more machinery than is requisite for the safe disbursement of the public funds or the correct liquidation of the public accounts; and if any part operate uselessly (to say nothing of the needless expense involved) it must operate injuriously, by retarding the prompt action of the Departments and by subjecting the claimants upon them to inconvenient and vexatious delays.

"'If we examine the different parts of the machinery, and look at its means of giving information of the operations of the Departments, we shall find that the system is not less imperfect. The duties are not distributed and arranged among the different offices in the most appropriate and suitable way, their limits of authority are not clearly laid down, and there wants a single office for general deposit and access after the accounts have gone through their course of settlement. To obtain information, in a system so deficient in order, is by no means easy even to the executive officers, whilst to Congress it must often prove exceedingly embarrassing.

"'If it is frequently a matter of perplexity to Congress, to a committee, or to an individual to determine where he ought to apply, so, on the other hand, it is sometimes a matter of no less difficulty with the officers to decide which can or ought to furnish the required information.

"'To devise a system of accounts for the principal departments, which shall be more efficient for all the purposes for which it is designated, in the hands of the heads of those departments, and, through them, of the great head of the whole; and which shall be more prompt in the payment of money, in the settlement of accounts, the exhibition of results, and, withal, less expensive to the nation, is the object of the present inquiry.'

It is evident that some simplification of the present methods is necessary. The business of the Government has become so vast that already the public business is greatly delayed, and unless the system is simplified at an early date congestion is bound to occur. The system proposed by this bill seems to meet the requirements of the situation better than any plan which has heretofore been proposed, and can be more readily put into operation.

The report of the experts, showing the details necessary to carry out the proposed arrangement, is attached hereto as an appendix.

[Report No. 5.]

OFFICE OF THE EXPERTS UNDER THE COMMISSION TO EXAMINE THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1894.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
Chairman Joint Commission, etc.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your experts, in an examination of the accounting system of the Government in the Treasury Department, beg to make the following report and recommendations thereon:

The present system is an outgrowth of that established by the act of September 2, 1789, which created an Auditor, a Comptroller, a Treasurer, and a Register within the Treasury Department. In the beginning of the operations of the Government, the business of the accounting branch consisted of the examination and settlement of claims. These claims were presented in person or forwarded to the Auditor, who considered all the evidence and facts in the case, drew up a settlement, and forwarded it to the Comptroller for his decision.

This system was not found adequate for the settlement of the business of the War and Navy Departments. The act of May 8 1792, created an accountant for the War Department, and the act of July 16, 1798, created an accountant for the Navy Department. The accounts of expenditures on account of these Departments were settled by them.

The act of April 29, 1816, supplementary to the act of May 8, 1792, created an additional accountant for the War Department.

On the occasions of the said acts of 1792 and 1798 the disbursements of the Treasurer for the appropriations of the War and Navy Departments were required to be made, not by warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury countersigned by the Comptroller of the Treasury, as previously done in pursuance of the requisitions of those Departments, according to the act of 1789, but by warrants of the Secretaries of War and Navy, countersigned by their respective accountants, who were, nevertheless, partially held in check, by being required to report their settlements, from time to time, for the revision and approval of the officers of the Treasury.

The act of March 2, 1817, restored all settlements of accounts to the Treasury Department, and abolished the offices of accountants of the War and accountant of the Navy Departments, and created the Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Auditors, and the Second Comptroller; the Second and Third Auditors to audit the accounts of the War Department, and the Fourth Auditor to audit the accounts of the Navy Department; the accounts of these three Auditors to be reviewed or revised by the Second Comptroller; the Fifth Auditor to have the accounts of the State Department, Post-Office Department, and Indian Affairs, to be revised by the First Comptroller.

The act of April 25, 1812, created the General Land Office in the Department of the Treasury, the head of said office to be styled "Commissioner of the General Land Office." Section 9 of said act provides—

"That all returns relative to public lands, heretofore directed to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury, shall hereafter be made to the said Commissioner, who shall have power to audit and settle all public accounts relative to the public lands: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the said Commissioner, upon the settlement of any such account, to certify the balance and transmit the account with the vouchers and certificate to the Comptroller of the Treasury for his examination and decision thereon."

The act of March 3, 1849, provides—

"That the Secretary of the Interior shall perform all the duties in relation to the General Land Office, of supervision and appeal, now discharged by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall sign all requisitions for the advance or payment of money out of the Treasury on estimates or accounts approved or certified by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, subject to the same control now exercised by the First Comptroller of the Treasury."

The act of July 2, 1836, created the "Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department" (commonly called the Sixth Auditor), whose duty it is to audit and settle all accounts arising in the Post-Office Department, or relative thereto, and certify the balances arising thereon to the Postmaster-General, with the provision of an appeal to the First Comptroller.

Thus we have a system consisting of six Auditors, and (after the abolition of the office of Commissioner of Customs, as recommended by report No. 2 of the experts) of two Comptrollers and a Register. The settlements of the First and Fifth Auditors are reëxamined and reviewed by the First Comptroller; the settlements of the Second, Third, and Fourth Auditor are reexamined and reviewed by the Second Comptroller. The settlements of the Sixth Auditor are not reviewed by any Comptroller, except upon an appeal, when they are reviewed by the First Comptroller. The Commissioner of the General Land Office acts as the Auditor for the land accounts, and settlements are reëxamined and revised by the First Comptroller.

The present system is one of confusion, delay, and vexation, and we have failed to find anyone who has ever had any transactions with the Government, either as a claimant, as an officer of the Government, or on behalf of either, who has not just cause for complaint from the manner in which the Government audits accounts. It is the result of additions to the original system, patchwork, as it were, and is incongruous and complicated.

The creation, in 1812, of the General Land Office, an administrative bureau in the Treasury Department, with power to audit and settle accounts of land transactions, subject only to the examination and revision of the Comptroller, and the requirement that only one examination of these accounts should be made in the Treasury Department after the removal of the administrative jurisdiction to the Interior Department in 1849, and the creation of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department in 1836, making his settlement of an account final except upon an appeal, are the only changes in the accounting system which are progressive in their character.

The accounting department was established, as previously stated, to govern the audit of claims. The system of expenditures since that time has undergone a complete change.

The act of January 31, 1823 (section 3648 Revised Statutes), entitled "An act concerning the disbursement of public money," after making a general prohibition of advances of public money to contractors, agents, etc., provided—

That it shall be lawful, under the special direction of the President of the United States, to make such advances to the disbursing officers of the Government as may be necessary to the faithful and prompt discharge of their respective duties, etc.

The system of disbursing money by the Government at present is that, after the appropriation for the expenditure is made, the money, for the most part, advanced to the disbursing agent of the various Executive Departments, to be expended according to law; and the disbursing agent exercises as much care and as much effort to keep within the law as was probably exercised originally by the Auditor; the disbursing agent makes up his account covering his expenditures, and this account in most cases is revised in a Bureau in the Executive Department under which the disbursing agent acts.

The account is then sent to the proper Auditor for settlement under the Treasury Department accounting system, which system is so inoperative that it is found necessary to make advances to disbursing agents although there may be very large balances against them on the books of the Auditor or the Register of the Treasury.

For example, figures were taken from the ledgers in the office of the Third Auditor in November, 1893, showing forty-eight accounts at random (those of pension agents being all of such), as follows:

Class.	Number of accounts	Aggregate balance due United States.	Average balance.	Average bond.
Pension agents (includes two late agents)	20	$63,955,892.93	$3,197,794.07	$112,500.00
Commissary Department	11	1,483,410.25	138,855.48	15,636.36
Quartermaster's Department	9	525,028.24	58,336.47	22,777.77
Engineers	8	4,215,131.84	526,891.48	No bonds.

The same state of affairs exists in the offices of the Second and Fourth Auditors and the Register of the Treasury. The balances against the officers on the books of the Second and Fourth Auditors and the Register aggregate many millions, as they are accounts of paymasters and Indian agents and others, representing large advances. The settlements of the larger of these accounts are very much in arrears.

Advances are continually made to these officers, irrespective of the large balances charged against them. Thus the safeguards or checks upon the disbursing officers rest almost entirely with the heads of the Executive Departments under which the disbursements are made, and the work of the Auditors has therefore become only a technical examination of accounts long after payments have taken place, and the Auditors are not a factor in the active business of the Government.

The Auditors and Comptrollers have a large force of clerks to go over these accounts, in some cases years after the disbursements have been made, and an immense amount of time and labor is taken in establishing small differences, due for the most part to technical errors. The Auditors can not, on account of the unwieldly system that prevails and the time required to handle these accounts by the double detailed examination, be a proper check upon the disbursing officers.

The time elapsing from the date of rendering until the final settlement of the accounts passing through the several Auditors' offices is as follows:

First Auditor's Office, from two to six months.
Second Auditor's Office, from six months to two years.
Third Auditor's Office, from nine to seventeen months.
Fourth Auditor's Office, from five months to one year.
Fifth Auditor's Office, from three to six months.
Commissioner of the General Land Office, from three to four months.

These figures represent an average of the various classes of accounts, and many, of course, are delayed a much longer period. There are scarcely any accounts finally settled within a reasonable period, while for some of the officers who have gone out of service, as, for instance, Indian agents, it is as much as five years before the accounts are settled, and during all this time the vouchers and papers lie in one or another of the offices of the Treasury or administrative departments.

In order to determine the condition of a disbursing officer's account, assuming that the Auditor examined it promptly, it would then have to go to one of the Comptrollers, and the Auditor would lose all control of it; the Comptroller would then have jurisdiction of the account and could take it up when he saw fit. The clerk in his department would ignore all the decisions or work of the Auditor, making his own findings, which, being confirmed by the Comptroller would make the decisions thereon final and conclusive, and the result or settlement would then be entered upon the disbursing officer's account; thus the result of the audit is the finding of the Comptroller alone, and is in no way dependent upon any work done in the Auditor's Office.

It would seem to be consistent with good business principles and a means of protection to the interests of the Government, if the Auditors were some check upon the disbursing officers who are expending vast sums of the public money; and if it were required that the accounts of disbursing officers should reach the Auditor within a specified time after the close of the period covered by the accounts, and that they should be audited within another specified period; and that the result of this examination or accounting should be known before further advances are made to the said disbursing officer, it would take less time and less labor to audit the accounts promptly than it takes now under the present cumbrous and antiquated system.

In order to be able to audit these accounts promptly, thereby securing a close and efficient check over the disbursing officer, the second and unnecessary examination by the Comptroller must be stopped; and the audit of the Auditor should be final and conclusive upon the Executive branch of the Government, except in case of an appeal, when a revision of the account should be made by the Comptroller.

Under present conditions, with the vast expenditures by the Government, it would be impossible to construct an active and efficient accounting department in which the accounts would have to be revised by two different Auditors or Comptrollers. The double detailed examination in the Treasury Department is unnecessary, as the administrative officers keep as close a supervision over, and make as careful an examination of, their expenditures as was originally done by the Auditor at the foundation of the Government.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I regret very much to differ with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], but considerable attention given by me to this matter impels me to do so.

To a person going into one of the Departments here from an active business office, the difference in methods is certainly very striking. While the methods of business in our great establishments, railroads, banks, and factories have been progressing so that they are substantially revolutionized from what they were forty or fifty years ago, those of the Government have not only not progressed, but have doubtless actually retrograded.

I do not contend that the Government should model its methods entirely upon the methods of business houses; the methods of the Government should be of the most conservative and safe character; but there is no reason in the world, while business methods have made such great progress, that the Government methods should not be improved somewhat. A bank in these times which does not know at the close of every day's business its standing with every customer, would be behind the times; a manufacturing or mercantile concern which did not answer its correspondence within at least twenty-four hours and have the business to which the correspondence related under way, would also be losing in the game of competition.

Look, for instance, at the reasons which have led to these business methods of mercantile corporations, which have progressed on account of the active spirit of the age. Railroads, telegraphs, and sharp competition have compelled it to do so; while, on the other hand, the methods of the Government, established more than one hundred years ago, have been in the hands of officials serving for a long time, and the natural effect of that service is to render them hair-splitters and mechanical in their operations, and their natural tendency is to increase the machinery rather than to simplify it.

I admit that the Government methods are ancient; they have in fact the moss and fungus of antiquity hanging thickly about them. Started a hundred years ago, with a population of four or five millions, it would be very strange that they should be adapted to our present wants. In fact, they were found in a very short time to be insufficient.

The Senator from Ohio calls attention to the proposed change of designation of the Auditors. That was recommended more than sixty years ago by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Levi Woodbury. He said:

It is therefore recommended that their designation by numbers be changed, and the duties assigned to each be more simplified and rendered more intelligible, by a new division of them, in part, and by attaching one of these officers, and one only, to each Department.

Another report made more than fifty years ago to Congress states:

The complexity of the public accounts is a matter of general remark, and all who examine the subject must concur in the President's opinion that the system requires a general reform. * * * The duties are not distributed and arranged among the different offices in the most appropriate and suitable way; their limits of authority are not clearly laid down.

* * * * * * *

To devise a system of accounts for the principal departments, which shall be more efficient for all the purposes for which it is designated, in the hands of the heads of those departments, and, through them, of the great head of the whole; and which shall be more prompt in the payment of money, in the settlement of accounts, the exhibition of results, and, withal, less expensive to the nation, is the object of the present inquiry.

Mr. President, it is true that there should be ample guards for the safety of the Government, but it is not, in my opinion, true that a needless multiplication of machinery in the examination of accounts is for the safety of the Government. In fact the rogue will take advantage of this very machinery. If he starts his account, as he goes around through the different processes, his claim is reinforced oftentimes, rather than its fraudulent character detected, by this machinery. The delays, too, which such a system necessarily involves tend to help the dishonest claimant and to injure the honest one.

I should be very glad to submit this question to anyone who has business with the Departments and has not a Congressman behind him to secure expedition.

The report of the commission and the recommendations they have made I have examined carefully, and I believe to be extremely conservative. They do not aim to adopt all the prompt methods which an ordinary business house would adopt; but on the contrary, to preserve to the Government all necessary precautions, and to secure not so much economy in the transaction of business, as directness and simplicity and promptness.

This measure has received the examination and unanimous approval of the commission and of two committees of this body. It has also received the full approval of the present Secretary of the Treasury and of his predecessor. I will read, as it is only a sentence, what Mr. Foster, the last Secretary of the Treasury, said of it. He said:

I have very carefully examined the provisions of the bill, H. R. 6948, improving the methods of accounting in the Treasury. I believe the bill will secure the speedy and reliable audit of the expenditures of the Government, infinitely superior to the present system.

In regard to the experts who were employed by the commission, I have seen much of them, and spent a good deal of time with them in going over the details of their recommendation. I have the very highest opinion of their ability. I think the commission was peculiarly fortunate in their selection. I confess my only surprise was that they were so very fortunate. These experts are men thoroughly competent, experienced, and skillful, and have been extremely careful and conservative in their methods.

It is true, as the Senator from Ohio remarked, that with all the complaints, no important changes have been made in the past methods of accounting in the Treasury Department. That is not at all strange. It is a very difficult matter to overturn customs and traditions and usages, and the opposition of personal attachment to present system, and the opposition of officials to any change in the Departments is to be expected, as everyone knows they are the most conservative possible body. I believe these changes have been very carefully prepared and that they are entirely safe. I feel sure that if there is any detail which is not perfect, it is so nearly so that no harm can come to the interest of the Government. No progress can be made without a beginning.

I am heartily in favor of these provisions of the bill, and I should consider it very unfortunate, after the very great labor which has been expended upon it, that the results should now be lost.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am perfectly satisfied, notwithstanding the criticisms of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], that if that Senator had given to the matter of the entire reorganization of the system of accounting in the Treasury Department the same care, attention, and labor which others have given to it, he would heartily indorse it as a better system to accomplish what he has so strongly advocated than the existing Treasury system. We all want the Treasury perfectly guarded. I say, in my judgment, this bill guards the interests of the Treasury more sacredly and more closely and more stringently than the existing system.

There is nothing particularly sacred about the present system. It is not the system of Alexander Hamilton; it is not the system of any one man; it is a mere patch-quilt; it is made up of enactments at different times. We started out with the Treasury Department under the act of September 2, 1789, having an Auditor, a Comptroller, a Treasurer, and a Register. Their principal business was to examine the individual accounts of employés of the Government. The machinery was very simple, and there was very little business to be done. We did not then have disbursing officers, receiving in advance of any expenditure hundreds of millions of dollars, whose applications for advances had to be considered. There was nothing of that kind. It was a very simple process. This system has grown up, as I have stated, by enactments at different times.

By the act of May 8, 1792, a short time after the organization of that system, there was created an accountant for the War Department, and then the act of July 16, 1798, created an accountant for the Navy Department, and the accounts of expenditures in those Departments were settled by them.

The act of April 29, 1816, supplementary to the act of May 8, 1792, created an additional accountant for the War Department.

On the occasions of the said acts of 1792 and 1798, the disbursements of the Treasurer for the appropriations of the War and Navy Departments were required to be made, not by warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury countersigned by the Comptroller of the Treasury, as previously done in pursuance of the requisitions of those Departments, according to the act of 1789, but by warrants of the Secretaries of War and Navy, countersigned by their respective accountants, who were, nevertheless, partially held in check by being required to report their settlements from time to time for the revision and approval of the officers of the Treasury.

Then various changes were made. The Land Office was created by the act of 1812, and it was given jurisdiction of its own accounts. The act of July 2, 1836, created an Auditor for the Post-Office Department. So the system has finally grown up of having the six different Auditors.

The Senator from Ohio complains that we have an Auditor for a special department. In other words, any man looking at this reorganized system, and looking at the names of the Auditors can tell where to inquire to find the status of an account. No man living can do it to-day. I venture to say that I can suggest an account of which the Senator from Ohio, with his long Congressional experience, could not tell what Department has jurisdiction. The names of the Auditors give no idea of the subjects-matter over which they have jurisdiction.

The Senator speaks about an Auditor growing up under each Department. The State Department has a separate Auditor now. One Auditor audits all the accounts of the State Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the people of the United States understand that matter very well. When they want to file a claim they send it to the Secretary of the Treasury anyway. The great mass of the correspondence goes direct to him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not a particle of change is made in that respect.

The idea that a claim can come up and be presented to the Second Auditor, and that his decision is final, is simply absurd, I beg to say to the Senator. Claims must originate in some branch of the public service. That is a proposition which the Senator from Ohio can not deny. Now, in whatever branch of the public service they originate, they are either under the Department or the head of a bureau, and that Department or head of a bureau has to examine and audit every solitary one of them before they can reach the Auditor. They are to be audited, under the new system, by the Department in which they originate, or if it is a separate bureau, like the Geological Survey, etc., they are audited by the head of the bureau, as it is not under any Department, and they go to the Second Auditor.

The Senator complains that these Auditors will grow up and become a part of the Department. To-day the accounts of all the Departments are distributed among the Auditors. We simply redistribute them, and the Auditors will audit the same accounts, some of them the identical accounts, which they are auditing now. So there is no confusion, there is no necessity for any new books or anything of the kind. The system can be inaugurated at once.

The Senator from Ohio tells us this is a new matter and has not received any consideration. Mr. President, no matter has ever been presented to the Senate during the long term of the Senator from Ohio which has received more careful consideration than this question. When, for example, the question of creating the Congressional commission came up, the late Secretary Foster came before the committee and insisted upon experts in order to readjust and bring the system up to current work. It was largely at his suggestion that the change was made from the method provided for in the other House. Now, what was done? Here are three experts, able men, disinterested, in no manner connected with the Government. They come here and go through the Treasury Department. They consult every head of a bureau; they consult the Assistant Secretary; they consult the subordinates. They go to the desks where the work is performed; they ascertain the entire method and system and the responsibility. When they have done that, they confer with the Secretary of the Treasury, they confer with the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and they discuss their plans.

Now, those experts are under a commission of members of Congress. Ex-Governor DINGLEY, Representative from Maine, is one of the active members, and Representative DOCKERY of Missouri another. The experts conferred with them. The Senate commission, composed of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr JONES], and myself, consulted with them. They made to us a report recommending this change.

Upon that report we drew bills for this reorganized system. Such a bill was reported to the other House, and a similar bill was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments.

The Senator from Ohio pretends that the bill has never been before any committee of the Senate. It was referred to the appropriate committee, the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments. Not only that, but such a bill passed the House of Representatives and came to the Senate, and was then referred to the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments. It has been reported favorably to the Senate, and is upon its Calendar.

Here we have a proposition to bring the business in the Treasury Department down to current work, to simplify the methods of doing business, and to guard the Treasury in every avenue which approaches to it as well as, if not better than, under the present system. It has been considered by the experts, who have conferred with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretary, the commission on the part of the other House, ex-Gov. DINGLEY and Mr. DOCKERY, and the members on the part of the Senate whom I have named. They have all approved it.

It has been reported by the commission to both Houses; it has been passed by the House of Representatives; twice reported favorably by the proper committee of the Senate, the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments. It was then properly placed as a provision in the legislative bill, providing money for the conduct of business in the Treasury Department and specifying the machinery by which the money shall be expended. It has been favorably reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and I say that no measure ever received fuller or more careful consideration. It is wise, it is just, and it is perfectly safe to the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to record my vote. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUAY. I suggest that there is not a quorum of the Senate present. If the yeas and nays are called for, there will not be a voting quorum present.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we shall not be prevented, by a call of the yeas and nays, from going through with the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I want is one vote. I am perfectly willing to take the vote Monday morning, if the Senator from Missouri prefers, and we can proceed with something else. Let it be understood that with the exception of this one question the bill is disposed of. I do not think there will be any trouble about it. But I believe there is a quorum here.

Mr. CULLOM. There is a quorum present, but not a voting quorum.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been suggested that there is no quorum present. I do not see how we can proceed after such a suggestion has been made.

Mr. CULLOM. We can not do it very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Since it has been suggested, I do not see how we can avoid having the roll called under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have asked for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment, and that will develop whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. PATTON]. I withhold my vote in his absence.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his called was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. POWER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I reserved the right to vote to make a quorum, however.

Mr. CULLOM. I am satisfied the Senator from Massachusetts would vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH. It is suggested that the Senator from Massachusetts would agree with me on this question. So I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT. Has the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. PLATT. I am paired with the junior Senator from Virginia. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRICE. I am paired with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORDON. By an arrangement with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON], and vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT. I vote "yea."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who, I am informed, is not present and has not voted. I therefore withhold my vote, unless it shall be necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I am advised, and am perfectly sure, that if he were present he would vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. At the suggestion of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JARVIS], I transfer my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BRICE. I vote "nay" to make a quorum.

Mr. VILAS. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], but as my vote is necessary to make a quorum I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SHOUP. I am informed that if the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] were present he would vote "nay." I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY. I will take the liberty of voting to make a quorum. I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], but I will vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. COKE (after having voted in the negative). I am told that I have been paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas withdraws his vote.

Mr. POWER. I will vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I feel at liberty to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. COKE. In order to make a quorum I will vote. I vote "nay."

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate by a speech upon this provision of the bill, but I desire to say that the proposition comes to us from a body not recognized by the Constitution of the country. It comes from a joint legislative commission, whereas the provision of the Constitution requires that each House shall appoint its committees and establish its rules of procedure.

It is a commission appointed not by the living Senate and House. It is a selection of members of this body by an expired Congress, vested with power to sit upon its own motion, to draw its own warrants upon the Treasury for any amount that it may decide to be its legitimate expense. That may be cured by such a plan being brought to this body and referred to the proper committee of the body which has reported upon it.

Here it is proposing to change the entire methods of business of this great Government and its thousands of millions of expenditures. Here it is, proposing on an appropriation bill to change the personnel of the entire administration of the Government. Upon what? The reports of experts provided by that commission, and upon a report of a single committee of this body, without consideration. Let its merits be what they may, that, in my judgment, is not a proper method of proceeding for this body, charged with the most important functions of legislation.

The plan, if it be meritorious, would have come to this body and met with ample discussion. The methods of business and the personnel through which the business is transacted are matters of great consideration and importance in the administration of this Government, and upon this body more than all others is imposed the duty of a careful scrutiny and full knowledge and information on the part of each member before a radical change is made in the methods of administration.

As I am the only Democrat who voted in the affirmative on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and one Senator among four who have voted that this body should take the time and that every member should consider and understand the merits of an important change in the administration of the Government, I make this suggestion.

I have a high opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle. I am willing to vote for anything in his Department he may recommend, whether it be this bill or any other, but the methods by which the Senate shall act on it are not included in his recommendation. The Secretary is a great man and a patriotic man, and in voting against this bill I do not disregard his recommendations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to add at the end of line 7, page 141, the following proviso:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to the existing laws in regard to the contingent funds of Congress.

That is to leave the contingent funds of the Senate and House just as they are now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let the next amendment which was passed over be acted upon

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 5, to insert:

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting on page 32, line 9, after the word "five" the word "thousand," so as to read "at the rate of $5,000 per annum." It is an omission in the print.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, which had been passed over, was, on page 32, after line 19, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 6, to insert:

For the temporary employment of clerks within the classified service to complete the accounts in the offices of First and Second Comptrollers and Commissioner of Customs, on hand at the date of the approval of this act, $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the top of page 34, after the words "on hand," I move to insert "October 1, 1894," and to strike out in line 2 "at the date of the approval of this act;" so as to read:

For the temporary employment of clerks within the classified service to complete the accounts in the offices of First and Second Comptrollers and Commissioner of Customs, on hand October 1, 1894, $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 15 I move to strike out "deputy," before "register," and insert "assistant," so as to read, "Assistant Register."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. All the reserved amendments have been agreed to.

Now, on page 64, in lines 13 and 14, in regard to the mint at Denver, I move to strike out "$13,750" and insert "$17,500;" and then, for incidental and contingent expenses, in lines 15 and 16, to strike out "$2,750" and insert "$4,000."

I hold in my hand the following telegram from the Director of the Mint:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 14, 1894.

HON. F. M. COCKRELL,
Committee on Appropriations:

The business of the Denver mint has increased to such a volume that the amount provided for wages of workmen and contingent expenses in the legislative bill now pending will not be sufficient for the fiscal year 1895. The amount of the business for first six months of 1894, as compared with the first six months of 1893, has increased about 130 per cent. I think the appropriation for wages of workmen at Denver should be increased to $17,500, and for contingent expenses to $4,000, as it is plain that the appropriation provided for in the bill will not be sufficient.

R. E. PRESTON, Director Mint.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 5, after line 8, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

For clerk of Committee on Woman Suffrage and clerk of Committee on Mines and Mining, at $2,100 each (for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895 only), $4,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. After consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I move, on page 109, line 2, before the word "dollars" in the items for office of surveyor-general of the State of Washington, to strike out the words "one thousand two hundred" and insert "two thousand;" so as to read:

For rent of office for the surveyor-general, fuel, books, stationery, pay of messenger, and other incidental expenses, $2,000.

I will state that this is for the incidental expenses for rent of office of the surveyor-general of Washington. The chairman stated yesterday that he had already then provided an appropriation of only $1,200 when $2,000 was estimated for; and I understand that he is now willing that this amount for incidental expenses shall be made to accord with the estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I have another amendment to offer. I have not had an opportunity to speak with the chairman about it, but I have no doubt he will consent to it.

Yesterday the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER] proposed as an amendment the insertion of the following proviso on page 129:

Provided, That the marshal and district attorney of the districts of Washington, Montana, North Dakota, and South Dakota shall, for the services they may perform during the fiscal year herein provided for, receive the fees allowed by law to like officers performing similar duties in the districts of Oregon and Idaho.

That amendment was agreed to, but in it there was an accidental omission. I do not think it was the intention at the time. The word "clerk" should be inserted in the amendment just after the word "marshal," so as to read:

That the marshal, clerk, and district attorney of the districts, etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment that was made yesterday did not affect the clerks. This is a new proposition entirely.

Mr. SQUIRE. I beg to state for the information of the chairman of the committee that it is very important that the amendment shall be allowed to cover the case of clerk. I have in my hand a communication addressed to me by the United States district judge for the district of the State of Washington, and another from the United States district attorney for the State, in which they very strongly urge that this provision shall be made. I will read, if the Senate will hear me, the following:

The clerks of the United States circuit and district courts in this State are required by law to have offices in four different places, and considerable expense to them for assistants is absolutely necessary, which is repaid to them only from earnings of their offices. They have during the past two years, by a proviso in the annual appropriation laws, been put on an equal footing as to fees with the clerks of California, Oregon, Nevada, and Idaho. Double rates allowed elsewhere. But in the appropriation for fiscal year of 1894, while the district attorney and marshal are so provided for, the clerks get left. (See 27th Statutes, page 714.) This is certainly an unreasonable discrimination, and it bears especially hard upon the clerk at Seattle and the deputy clerk at Spokane.

I would not ask you to attempt anything which you may regard as impossible at this special session. But if no unreasonable opposition is to be expected I should think that a bill or joint resolution amending the proviso so as to make it include clerks might be passed.

The compensation of the clerks, district attorneys, and marshals of this State, Montana, and the two Dakotas ought to be fixed permanently at a rate uniform with the allowance to such officers in Oregon and the other States west of the Rocky Mountains.

This is from Mr. C. H. Hanford, district judge of the United States court. I have here a communication addressed by the United States attorney, Mr. William H. Brinker, to Representative DOOLITTLE, going over the same ground, insisting upon the same provision. I think, considering the fact that the United States district court in the State of Washington has had and is likely to have a very great amount of business to perform in comparison with the courts of these other States, it is only right that this allowance shall be made.

I recollect hearing a statement, well authenticated, a few days ago to the effect that the business recently performed in connection with the arrest and trial of something like two hundred train-stealing people in the West has caused a great deal of work to be thrown upon the courts of my State. While that particular incident has passed by, we are not yet out of the woods in respect to the action necessary on the part of the United States courts, as several railroads, including the Northern Pacific Railroad, are in the hands of United States receivers, as is well known. Similar conditions may affect the other States named.

There is very much to be done in these courts, and I think it would be wrong to omit the clerks from the provision in relation to pay. There is no good reason for discrimination against any of the States named in this connection. Therefore I offer the amendment that the word "clerk" be inserted after the word "marshal" in the place I have designated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 129, in the first line of the amendment adopted yesterday, after the word "marshal" insert the word "clerk;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the marshal, clerk, and district attorney of the districts of Washington, Montana, North Dakota, and South Dakota shall for the service they may perform during the fiscal year herein provided for, receive the fees allowed by law to like officers performing similar duties in the districts of Oregon and Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 72, I want to make a change in increasing the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Territory of Utah, to be expended by the governor, from $500 to $750. In line 7, I move to strike out "$500" and insert "$750," and in line 9, to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$2,000," increasing the appropriation for contingent expenses of the secretary of the Territory from $1,500 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. On page 10, line 1, I move to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "thirty-six;" and in line 3, page 10, I move to strike out "thirty-eight thousand eight hundred" and insert "fifty-two thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

CAPITOL POLICE.

For one captain, $1,600; three lieutenants, at $1,200 each; thirty-six privates, at $1,100 each; and eight watchmen, at $900 each; in all, $52,000, one-half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JARVIS. On page 5, line 5, after the word "Rules," I move to insert the words "and Civil Service and Retrenchment."

Mr. COCKRELL. It is exceedingly unpleasant for me to have to object to that amendment. That would add another annual committee clerk to the rolls. I had hoped that after the controversy we have had in regard to clerks to Senators and clerks to committees, and after the adjustment which was mutually agreed upon in the last Congress, we would not be disturbed with that question again. I sympathize with the Senator offering this amendment, and with his clerk, but I do hope that the Senate will not agree to the amendment.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think this amendment ought to be agreed to. The clerk of this committee was serving as clerk of our lamented colleague, Senator Vance, and as clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He was serving and appointed at that salary. While that furnishes no direct argument or reason for increasing his salary he has been transferred to a committee whose duties ought to be considered as of the highest importance, the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

That is the committee which should have been charged with the investigation of the work of the commission, and it still has a vast field of work to do, which it is impossible for it to perform without the services of an efficient clerk. If there is any duty which the Senate ought to perform it is that of equipping itself and its committees with the means of intelligently performing the duties imposed upon it.

The House of Representatives has no right to say to the Senate that it shall not have the instrumentalities which you decide are proper and necessary for the conduct of the public business. If we have difficulty with them in their endeavor to encroach upon the prerogative and the functions and duties of this body, it is an antagonism which we ought cheerfully to meet. There is no committee of this body that is charged with higher and more important duties than the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

This body to-day has acted upon a report of a commission unknown to the Constitution and to the rules of this body and to its organization, which work should have been confided to the careful examination of this important Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. Now, the clerk of this committee was the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and had accepted the appointment as such. He was transferred by the death of his father to an equally important committee, but with a salary entirely inadequate to the duties required of him.

I think the Senate ought to have no hesitation in increasing the appropriation.

I wish to say that two-thirds of the Senators on both sides of this Chamber have signed a request that this provision should be reported favorably by the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and the only reason why it was not done was because it was believed that a statute of the United States prevented the use of the contingent fund of this body without the action of the Senate upon the general appropriation bill.

That is the reason why this clerk is not now in the receipt of this compensation. I say two-thirds of the Senators of this body, a majority on both sides of this Chamber, have signed a letter which is in the possession of the chairman of this committee, affirming their belief and their intention and willingness to vote for this compensation to the clerk of this committee.

Mr. JARVIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to disturb any of the harmony between the two Houses, and if I thought offering this amendment would have that effect I would withdraw it; but I believe under the circumstances it is a proper amendment, and I trust it will be adopted. It only adds $200 to the amount the bill carries, transferring this clerk from one page in the bill to another. I trust that under the circumstances the Senate will let the amendment be put in. I do not wish to embarrass the chairman of the committee, as I appreciate his position in the matter, and if I thought, I repeat, that the adoption of the amendment would create any trouble, I would not insist upon it. Believing that it will not, I ask the Senate to adopt it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. JARVIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWER. I wish to offer an amendment. On page 5, line 10, after the word "each," I move to insert the following:

And further, That the three clerks to the Senators from the States of Washington, Wyoming, and Montana, respectively, shall each receive the same compensation until the said States shall elect their full representation as clerks to committees heretofore provided for.

And further, in line 11, on the same page, I move to strike out the total "$41,760" and insert in lieu thereof "$46,080."

Mr. COCKRELL. The amedment is not in proper form, if it were to be agreed to. I suggest the following modification of it:

That each of the clerks to the Senators now serving respectively from the States of Washington, Wyoming, and Montana, shall receive like compensation until the existing vacancies in the Senate from such States shall be filled.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

Mr. COCKRELL. When the amendment is stated, I should like to hear some reason why this increase is wanted. It is an increase from $1,200 to $1,440.

Mr. POWER. Mr. President, the work of the clerks of the Senators representing the States of Washington, Wyoming, and Montana has been greatly increased, owing to the fact of there being but one Senator from each of those States. Since the beginning of the extra session I have had to employ an extra clerk to assist my secretary in attending to the business required by the State. Twelve hundred dollars a year does not seem sufficient compensation for the work required of those men. The total addition for the three clerks covered by the amendment will be only $720 a year.

I suppose it is not necessary to add anything further, as what has been said explains why the amendment has been offered.

Mr. SQUIRE. I will merely add a word, and shall not take up the time of the Senate at any great length.

My own experience is that the work devolving upon each of the single Senators now representing in this body the three States named has been very largely augmented; that is, the burden upon the single Senators has been largely increased beyond what it was when each of these States was represented by two Senators in this body. Of course, a great deal of this labor involves the service of clerks and extra clerks. I myself have paid out over $1,000 for extra services of clerks since the beginning of this Congress, and the clerks are very hard worked.

Let me state as one of the reasons why this increase should be made, that the books and documents which are furnished for distribution by the Government require a great deal of attention. There is a great call for such documents. My clerk has assisted me to send out since the 1st of last December about 5,000 volumes of books, to say nothing about speeches and the ordinary current documents—I mean the regular publications, which are put at the disposal of different Senators.

The reason why I was enabled to ship this vast amount of printed matter to my constituents was because all the various publications, that had hitherto been accorded to the other Senator from my State, when the State was represented by two Senators, were transferred to my credit, so that actually the distribution of books was made by me for both the Senators that the State is entitled to be represented by in this body. It has so happened that in many other respects, owing to the increased labors devolving upon the Senators from those States, that much additional labor has been performed.

In many instances the books and other publications called for by my constituents are of an unusual character, being descriptive, professional, scientific, or statistical; and the procuring and sending such publications involves extra correspondence.

My constituents are of the live, wide-awake kind of people. They want to know everything knowable about the land and the sea, and all they contain.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator how the increase of the salary of the present clerks employed by the year from $1,200 to $1,400 can make them do any more work, or dispense with the necessity of employing additional clerks?

Mr. SQUIRE. On that point I will say that the clerks have been overworked. My clerk has been at work from 9 o'clock in the morning sometimes until 9 and 10 at night, and right along day after day. Too much work has been imposed on these clerks for the compensation paid them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the appropriation ought not to be made for these clerks, but it ought to be made to be expended under the direction of the Senators from the States named, so that they may hire additional help.

Mr. SQUIRE. I will be satisfied to pay the amount for an extra clerk if the clerk I now have can have this additional compensation, and I think he is entitled to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "each," in line 10, page 5, it is proposed to insert:

That each of the clerks to the Senators now serving, respectively, from the States of Washington, Wyoming, and Montana shall receive like compensation until the existing vacancies in the Senate from such State shall be filled.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. On page 108, line 2, after the word "dollars," I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 2, on page 108, it is proposed to insert:

For librarian of the Supreme Court, who shall have charge of the Law Library of Congress, $2,500; for two assistants, one at $1,600 and one at $1,400, and one messenger at $600. These four men, now in the Law Library, shall hereafter be under the direction of the Chief Justice.

Mr. CALL. If that amendment be adopted, I shall move some additional amendments.

Mr. HALE. That is subject to a point of order, Mr. President, and I make the point of order upon it.

Mr. CALL. What is the point of order?

Mr. HALE. That the amendment proposes to change the existing law, which gives the whole matter to the charge of the Congressional Librarian. It proposes to create an additional officer, a new librarian.

Mr. CALL. The amendment has been recommended by two committees of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. That may be, but the mere recommendation of a committee of the Senate only makes an additional item of an appropriation or an increase of appropriation in order, but does not make any change of the law in order.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator please read the law? Will he point out the law which this amendment proposes to change? There is no law upon the subject. A librarian is provided for in the annual appropriation bill, and an assistant to the librarian. These are provided for in the pending bill, and this is a new bill, a new appropriation, and there is no existing law upon the subject. I have the law here, which I propose to read.

Mr. HALE. The amendment proposes to create a new office which is not authorized by the present law. There is no such officer as the librarian of the Supreme Court, and there is no law which makes him an officer. When the Senator seeks to make a new officer, he thereby proposes to change existing law by making a new law.

Mr. CALL. The last appropriation bill has expired; it is no longer in force; and there is no law but that contained in that appropriation bill. This appropriation bill we are now considering creates whatever office there will be.

Mr. HALE. That is the very thing I contend that an appropriation bill can not do. It can not create a new office.

Mr. CALL. I beg the Senator's pardon. There is no such rule for appropriation bills. When such a bill provides for the employment of a person it creates an office in some shape or form, either as an employé or otherwise.

Mr. HALE. Not if a point of order is made against it. There is no authority to create a new office, because that is general legislation, which makes it, so far as it goes, a new law.

Mr. CALL. There is no force in that proposition, and no logic in it. It is repeated here time and time again without any meaning whatever. Every appropriation bill creates in some measure an employment. If you choose to call that an office, then it has that characteristic. An office is a permanent function. This bill provides that these shall be employés under the direction of the Chief Justice. That is all. It does not create an office any more than do other provisions of the bill.

This subject has been before Congress on a former occasion, and it is easy to change the amendment so as to meet the views of the Senator.

It will be seen by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that this subject was considered and discussed in the last Congress. Mr. Dawes being in charge of the legislative appropriation bill, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] said:

I hope the member of the committee having this subject in charge will at least let the Senate vote as to whether the judges of the Supreme Court shall name the librarian in charge of its library as well as to attend through its marshal to the distribution of the money appropriated for the purpose of keeping the library supplied with books.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said:

I should like to inquire of my colleague if he understands that these persons are to be public officers when appointed?

The Senator from Massachusetts is a member of the Judiciary Committee and is a member of the Committee on the Library, and in reference to this same appropriation which the Senate passed, in like manner as this amendment, he said:

I suggest that he make his amendment so as to require the appointment to be made by the Supreme Court, because if they are to be public officers, the Chief Justice is not a court. Of course, if they are to be mere clerical assistants, the Chief Justice may select them.

Mr. VEST. There is no objection to that.

Mr. DAWES. I will modify my suggestion in order to meet the wishes of the Judiciary Committee.

The Senator from Maine raises this point of order against the authority of the Judiciary Committee, against the authority of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], against the authority of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], against the authority of a majority of the Committee on the Library, and against the action of the Senate at that time. The then Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Dawes, said further:

I move, on page 17, in line 15, to strike out the word "two," where it first occurs, and insert the word "three;" and to insert after the word "each," in the sixteenth line:

"One of whom shall be appointed by the Supreme Court and have charge of the Law Library."

So as to read:

"For compensation of Librarian, $4,000; and for twenty-eight assistant librarians, three at $2,500 each, one of whom shall be appointed by the Supreme Court, and have charge of the Law Library; two at $1,800 each, etc."

Mr. HOAR. After this question is put, if there is no debate on it, I will say what I wish to say.

So that the amendment did pass the Senate, and it was recommended by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives; but it went into conference and was stricken off by a Representative from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. That is the whole story about it.

The Senate has twice adopted this amendment and twice acted upon this question and two committees of the Senate and a majority of the Committee on the Library here to-day are on record upon it. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is on record for it, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has recommended it and is here upon record in a speech; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was a member of the Committee on the Library at that time, indorsed it, and the Committee on the Library of the House recommended it.

Here is the record. There is no question about it.

What are the facts in this case? I undertake to say there is no legislation not affecting the important and vital functions of the Government which is more clearly demanded by the facts of the case than this is at this time. I shall read a statement from a distinguished lawyer, who uses the Law Library, and who has given the statement to me. He says:

The Law Library was organized by act of Congress July 14, 1832, when the whole number of books in the Library of Congress, including the law books, did not number 40,000 volumes. Congress properly then put one man at the head of the two libraries—two generations ago one man could well direct the duties of these libraries. The Supreme Court had but seven judges; its docket was not crowded then as it is now; there were but 112 Representatives in Congress, and 48 Senators; the country was in its infancy; Missouri was a State but eleven years; Arkansas (1836), Michigan (1832), Florida (1845), Iowa (1846), Texas (1845), Wisconsin (1848), were not yet States, while the visions of the Golden Gate had not yet startled the world. The copyright business was then done by the United States circuit courts. The total number of employés in the Library could be counted upon the fingers of one hand; so one man then could well be at the head of the two departments of the Library.

Twenty-two years ago the entire copyright business of the nation was transferred to the Library of Congress. Fifty thousand and more copyrights are being now issued yearly, more copyrights in one year than the whole number of books in the Library of Congress when the Law Library was created. The Law Library has increased to over 85,000 books, and the Library of Congress claims about 700,000 volumes. While all these changes have taken place the States of the Union doubled in number, the business of the nation increased a hundredfold, and consequently the litigation of the country increased; still the old statute creating the Law Library remains upon our statute books, continuing the management of the Law Library under the same regulations as were only suited to it some two generations ago.

The common law of England in the days of Littleton or Coke would be as applicable to-day in corporation law as the administration of the Law Library in the days of President Jackson would be to-day.

For over a quarter of a century the Law Library has been without a subject catalogue. In a word, the Law Library, instead of being abreast of the times, is a quarter of a century behind them. For over a quarter of a century there has been no subject catalogue, and to-day when I go to the Library to find a work on a given subject, I am met with a big, bulky, unwieldy, incomplete, and imperfect blank-book filled with scraps of printed matter, with marginal notes; and even this makeshift of a catalogue is thumbworn, soiled, dirty, worn out, and falling to pieces, in keeping with the Library itself until a few years ago, when the present assistant in charge, after repeatedly failing to get authority and money to replace broken furniture and make the Library presentable for the use of Congress and the court, went to a furniture dealer and ordered the Library put in proper condition, the reading tables re-covered and cleaned, etc., and bound himself to pay the bill in case it was not paid.

This same assistant has, through his own endeavor, secured electric lights to be used in the dark alcoves during the day, and to light the library during night sessions, replacing coal oil lamps, the Law Library being required by law to remain open as long as either House is in session, while the general Library of Congress closes at dusk. New book cases, absolutely necessary to keep the books from the floor and to make shelf room for the tons of books piled up and left unarranged by his predecessor, were obtained through his own exertions, by repeated applications to the Architect of the Capitol. All the improvements now in the Law Library had to be fought for, and were obtained through the exertions of Mr. Curtis; and, had not Mr. HOLMAN objected, the Law Library would now have a subject catalogue not inferior to any library in the United States.

The House Judiciary Committee, last session, through Mr OATES, reported favorably a bill in the interest of good government for the Law Library—

The same as this amendment—

the Library Committee and Judiciary Committee of the Senate, last session, reported favorably a similar bill, which passed the Senate, and was defeated by Mr. HOLMAN in conference. This present session the Judiciary Committee again reports the bill favorably, and two Senators of the three constituting the Library Committee favor the measure, Mr. WOLCOTT having expressed his views and those of the Chief Justice on the subject on the 25th of February, last year, and Mr. VOORHEES also, in the same debate.

The salary of $2,500, which was paid the Law Librarian for eighteen years, and appropriated by the committee with the understanding that it was to be paid the Law Librarian, was taken, four years ago, from the Law Library and paid to a man in the general Library of Congress. The salary of the librarian of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York is $4,000 a year, and this library is a smaller library than the Law Library of Congress. The Librarian of the House Library and Librarian of the Senate Library each receive $2,500 a year, while the librarians of the small Department libraries are paid about the same amount. The Medical Library, Surgeon General's Office, a sister professional library, has an army officer at its head, at a salary of about $4,000, with a force of about thirty men, with salaries amounting to about $44,000 a year, besides an annual appropriation of $10,000 a year for binding and printing the subject catalogue, which has now reached the thirteenth volume.

In striking contrast with this, the assistant librarian, who has done all this work and whose predecessor for eighteen years received $2,500 a year, which has been taken away and appropriated to a man in the Congressional Library. The Law Library, with its 85,000 volumes, increasing at the rate of 3,000 volumes a year, in charge of a lawyer who is a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, an accomplished gentleman, and one who has made all these improvements, is given what? Twelve hundred dollars a year under the present administration.

The library itself until he became responsible for it had broken chairs, was without clean carpets; with books dusty and with these increasing volumes piled up every year in the corners of the library; and yet with this state of facts objection seems to be made and the point of order is raised upon a proposition which passed the Senate twice, having been reported by two committees of the Senate and also reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. This eminent lawyer says further:

A lawyer who is capable of attending to the duties of the Law Library of Congress (and the present Law Librarian is a member of the bar of the United States Supreme Court), if he is worth anything, he is worth $2,500. He is of great service to Senators and Representatives in questions of law, giving authorities and cases on all subjects which come before Congress. Certainly his services, it is submitted, are above those of a messenger, and yet, under the present management, or rather mismanagement, he is paid the magnificent sum of twelve hundred dollars per year.

The judges of the Supreme Court are unanimously of the opinion that the Law Library should be transferred to the court.

That is the statement.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to make one remark about the Law Library and the Law Librarian, Mr. Curtis. I have occasion frequently to examine books in that library, and I find that the arrangement is such that I can make no progress without the aid of the Librarian. I find further that this aid is always given promptly, intelligently, and efficiently.

I wish to state further, that in the large number of thousands of volumes which constitute that law library I find, without a great waste of time, that it is impossible to get at certain points which are under investigation, and I find that the Librarian is of great service to me, and I believe to all of us, in giving aid in such investigations.

I think the services of the man at the head of the Law Library are of that intelligent, efficient, and necessary kind which at least demand a salary of $2,500 a year.

Mr. CALL. It has been said in my hearing that Mr. Curtis has had something to do with the change that I am endeavoring to make. I desire to say that that is not true. I induced Mr. Curtis to make the statement to Senators which he has made. I insisted that he should do so, and it was demanded by members of the bar who were practicing in that court, who, as the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has said, had use for the books and for the services of the Librarian.

If anybody is to blame for coming here and moving an amendment which has been twice put upon the legislative appropriation bill upon the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee and passed by the Senate by a large majority, and for having the facts brought to the attention of the Senate, it is me, and not Mr. Curtis, who objected to it and declined to do it, until I insisted that he should go before the members of the Judiciary Committee and state the facts as they were.

Here is the provision by which the Congress of the United States gave to the Library these two assistants at $2,500 a year, and yet they have been taken away and the law disregarded. It appears in this very debate from Mr. Dawes's remarks that the provision was put on for the benefit of this Library, and yet it never had the benefit of it.

Mr HALE. The Senator from Florida is arguing this question upon the merits, which strictly he has no right to do until the point of order which has been made is ruled upon. I did not make the point of order unadvisedly. The third section of Rule XVI of the Senate provides that legislation of this kind or any general legislation shall not be incorporated upon an appropriation bill. It makes no difference what committee has reported it. Their report does not make a change of law allowable or permissible on an appropriation bill.

It is only to increase an item, but there is a special rule about legislation. When I made the point I had before me the statute, and if the Chair has any doubt about it, all he needs to do is to examine Chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes, where sections, one after another, are devoted to the Library of Congress. The statute provides that the President shall appoint a Librarian of Congress, and it goes on and declares what the Library shall be, who the officers shall be, and says in terms in section 81:

The Library of Congress shall be arranged in two departments, a general library and a law library.

Then it provides that the whole matter shall be under the Librarian of Congress.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question? Is not the question in controversy not who is to have general charge, but who is to have the appointment of an employé?

Mr. HALE. The law is exhaustive. It gives the Librarian the charge, declares what the Library shall be, declares who his officers shall be, declares to whom he shall report, declares that he shall give bond, and in terms declares that the whole subject shall be in his charge.

Now, the Senator from Florida proposes an amendment which radically changes the law. Congress can do that by a bill duly reported and passed by the two Houses of Congress. But it can not do it on an appropriation bill. The fact that heretofore such legislation has gone on appropriation bills because nobody chose to make the point of order does not bear in the case.

I make the point of order because this scheme was before the Committee on Appropriations and was rejected by them. It was rejected by the committee partly on the ground that it is a change of existing law and that we had no right to do it.

As to the merits of the amendment, while I do not need to go into that matter, I may say that nobody is claiming this or is clamoring for it except the man who wants to get the place. I tell the Senator, when he says that the man has not engineered this matter, that he has lobbied in season and out of season. There are very few Senators here whom he has not followed up and besought to give him this new place and take it away from the Librarian of Congress.

We are on the point of building one of the most magnificent structures in Washington for the general Library of Congress, and it would be an impertinence now for us to come in and take away from the Librarian an important part of the work he has been engaged in and an important part of the books and give them to one of his subordinates because that man wants more power and more money. It is not a fitting thing to do.

I shall not say another thing about the merits. If the point of order is not good, then I never submitted a point of order which was good.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Maine is right.

Mr. CALL. The fallacy of the proposition of the Senator from Maine is that the law provided for a certain number of persons to be appointed. Every year since that time additional appointments have been made.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Florida does not get my point.

Mr. CALL. Yes, I do.

Mr. HALE. The whole library, including the Law Library, is by the terms of the law put under the Librarian of Congress, and then it is declared what subordinates he may have. The amendment takes the appointment away from him and creates a new Librarian——

Mr. DOLPH. And a new library.

Mr. HALE. And a new library, as the Senator from Oregon suggests.

Mr. CALL. Does the act of 1832 say that all subseqent appointees shall be appointed and the salaries fixed by the Librarian? It provided for a law library under the general charge of Congress, and made provision for a certain number of employés. Even assuming, which is not true, that as a logical proposition the same employés have been continued in office, I ask what about the new employés that have been created by annual appropriation acts? Can not an appropriation bill provide who shall employ those people?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; it can not.

Mr. CALL. Did the act of 1832 intend to say that the Librarian shall appoint for all time everybody whom Congress sees fit to provide for? Its purview is by its terms limited to its contents, and to the employés therein provided for, and that is all.

Mr. HALE. But the statute which I have invoked is not an appropriation act. It is the fundamental law; it is the statute. It is a section devoted to this subject-matter, which makes it perfectly clear. You might just as well take a bureau from the Navy Department and put it in the Treasury Department, or another from the State Department and put it in the Interior Department, on an appropriation bill as to do this.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to point out the language of the law which says that all subsequent employés shall be in charge of the Librarian of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the question, Is the proposed amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is not received.

Mr. GEORGE. I will modify the amendment so as to make it in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 22, on page 18, insert:

For librarian having charge of the law library of Congress, $2,500; for two assistants, one at $1,600, one at $1,400, and one messenger at $600.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that the amendment creates a new office, which can not be done on an appropriation bill. There is no such officer as "librarian having charge of the law library." It is the Librarian of Congress.

Mr. HALE. Practically the same point which was decided before.

Mr. GEORGE. We will call him a clerk or employé.

Mr. MILLS. That is simply an evasion, and is equally liable to the point of order.

Mr. GEORGE. By every appropriation act the number of employés, clerks, messengers, etc., in every Department of the Government is added to. There is not a general appropriation bill which ever passed the Senate that did not have such an increase. If the Senator objects to the word "librarian," I will call him "messenger" or "the person in charge of the books." Librarian is not an office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the question, Is the proposed amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it. The amendment is not received.

Mr. CALL. I suggest another amendment. On page 18, line 13, I move to insert:

For compensation of Librarian, $4,000—

That is in the bill.

and for thirty-one assistants—

The word "assistants" is in the bill.

And for thirty-one assistants, three at $2,500 each, one of whom shall be employed by the Supreme Court as a messenger.

Mr. HALE. That amendment is subject to the same point of order. The law declares that—

The Librarian of Congress is hereby authorized to employ from time to time the following assistants.

It does not authorize the Supreme Court to employ anybody. The Senator does not escape the point of order by that proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

Mr. CALL. Let me read it first:

For compensation of Librarian, $4,000.

No point of order would lie aginst that, because it is in the bill now.

Mr. DOLPH. Then why repeat it?

Mr. CALL. Does not the Senator from Oregon understand that I wish to amend the paragraph by adding something to it? That is a very plain proposition.

Now, what we ask is—

Thirty-one clerks.

You call them assistants. I call them clerks. No point of order can be made on that.

Mr. HALE. There certainly can be. The chart that the Committee on Appropriations has to pursue under the law is the chart which is laid down in chapter 6. That statute provides just what the offices shall be, what the clerks shall be called, and who shall employ them. Wherever there is a variation from the statute, either that one of them shall be employed by the Supreme Court or that he shall be a different officer, you transcend the law. The Senate has already passed upon this matter twice. There ought not to be any question about the point of order.

After declaring what the duties of the Librarian of Congress shall be, the law says:

The Librarian of Congress is authorized to employ from time to time the following assistants.

Then it gives the assistants, their positions, their pay, and runs clear through the whole thing. It does not call any of them clerks. It calls them all assistants.

Mr. CALL. Then I understand the point of order is that it is not competent for Congress on an appropriation bill to require some clerks to be employed there.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly it is not.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the Senator from Florida will send up the amendment. I wish to make the point of order on the amendment as soon as he sends it to the desk. I can not make the point of order while the amendment is in his hands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

For compensation of Librarian, $4,000; and for thirty-one clerks, three at $2,500 each, one of whom shall be employed by the Supreme Court as a messenger.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order——

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Texas allow me for one moment before he makes the point of order? I desire to defend Mr. Curtis against the statements made by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MILLS. That is not in order on a point of order.

Mr. CALL. I ask consent to speak before the Senator from Texas makes the point of order.

I desire to say that Mr. Curtis has not been before this body, and that if he has buttonholed Senators, I have requested him to go and talk to particular Senators, who I thought were liberal enough to care for the proper condition of the Law Library and the dignity of the Supreme Court and its functions. He is a diffident man, and one not disposed to come here and lobby. But I do not know by what rule a citizen of the United States, a member of the bar of the Supreme Court, a gentleman of consideration and character, has not a right to talk to a Senator without having it said that he is buttonholing him.

A Senator is not so far above and beyond the people of his country that he can not be approached and the truth stated to him in regard to the public service. Is it true that the Senate can not hear statements as to the needs of the Law Library of the supreme tribunal of the United States from an accomplished gentleman, the value of whose services are testified to by lawyers of ability and character? His compensation is but $1,200, while the Senate wastes thousands of dollars in needless expense upon others. In the Senate thousands of dollars have been added to the appropriation bill, as to which nobody knows anything at all.

Yet here, in a meritorious case, with the precedent of the Senate in two Congresses having passed upon this provision, with the other House having passed upon it, with the Committee on the Judiciary having recommended it, the point of order is made for its exclusion. Why? What reasons do Senators give for continuing this administration, which has proved to be entirely adverse to the interests of the Government and the public service?

Mr. MILLS. I make the further point of order that the Senate has twice declared the amendment out of order.

Mr. CALL. That is no point of order at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. And it is not reported by the committee.

Mr. CALL. I beg pardon; it is reported by the Judiciary Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits the question to the Senate, Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is not received.

Mr. CALL. I have another amendment to suggest.

Mr. HALE. While the Senator from Florida is preparing his amendment, let the bill be reported to the Senate. The Senator can offer the amendment in the Senate. We will thus improve the time.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PROCTOR. On behalf of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I offer an amendment reported from the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, to be added at the end of section 26.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 26, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the duties devolved by the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, upon a Joint Commission to Inquire into and Examine the Status of the Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, etc., shall, after the passage of this act, be performed on the part of the Senate by the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments.

Mr. HALE. I am constrained to raise the point of order which the amendment itself carries. All those duties were by law, as recited in the amendment, devolved upon a joint commission selected by the two Houses. They have completed or partially completed their work, and with the benefit they have had from experience, if anybody should go further it should be the commission, under the law. The amendment provides in terms that the duties provided for in the act shall be taken from the commission and conferred upon a new committee. I raise the point of order that it is changing the existing law.

Mr. PROCTOR rose.

Mr. HALE. I waive the point of order so that the Senator from Vermont may discuss the question.

Mr. PROCTOR. I suppose the point of order of the Senator from Maine is made under the third clause of Rule XVI, as to amendments to appropriation bills, which reads:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

There is nothing said about existing law. The change of any word would perhaps be a change of existing law. I submit that the amendment is not in any essential general legislation. In the last Congress, in an appropriation act, provision was made for a commission, to consist on the part of the Senate of three Senators, to do certain work limited to the present Congress. It expires with the expiration of this Congress. Its duties were those which would properly come under the jurisdiction of a standing committee of the Senate.

The whole work properly pertains to the business of the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments. The amendment does not provide for any new duties or create any new offices, and does not affect anything or anybody outside of this Chamber. It merely transfers to another body the duties which were performed by what is really in essence a committee of the body, and should be held as a committee.

So far as concerns the skill, experience, and acquaintance of the commission, I may say that all the legislation has been before the committee. It has been a duplication of work, and really a drawback and hindrance to legislation. The business would go where the rules of the Senate contemplated it should go, to a properly organized standing committee. That is all the amendment provides for.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose there is any necessity of my arguing the point that this is general legislation. Everything is general legislation that is not found in the volumes of the statutes, and is not applicable to private persons and private cases.

The appropriation bills are general legislation. Although they are made up in detail of provisions about the Departments and about the different offices of the Government, they are general legislation. If we should Monday pass a bill providing that the President's salary shall be cut down to $25,000, while it would apply only to the President, it would be general legislation and it would go into the volume of general laws and not into the volume of private acts.

The clause from the rules which the Senator from Vermont has read means to apply to all such cases. Any enactment that is general, any enactment that makes up the law, no matter how limited in scope, is general legislation. It is not private legislation. Private legislation is another thing. General legislation is found in the statutes and is all embodied, just as this act of last winter is, in the statutes. What Congress ought to have done or ought not to have done, I do not know. What it did was to provide in terms that the duties should be performed for the entire Congress and by the Joint Commission. The frame of the amendment offered itself shows that it is a change of existing law.

Mr. PLATT. I think the Senator from Maine is carrying a good way his proposition that the amendment is out of order because it is general legislation. It simply proposes to transfer duties from one body of men to another body of men. That is not according to my idea of what is general legislation.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me? Suppose the amendment proposed to transfer the duties of the Coast Survey to a branch in another Department, would not that be general legislation? I do not mean to say that it is as general as the scope of certain other acts; but if there is anything in the force of the objection to an amendment on the ground of general legislation it is that it proposes to change the law found in the book of legislation.

Mr. PLATT. The legislation which is enacted on appropriation bills does not seem to me, especially when it is transitory in its character, to come up to the definition of general legislation. This is a matter which, as the Senator from Vermont says, expires with the present Congress. It is not a measure which was to be incorporated as a continuing provision in our statutes. It is a provision for the time being, where we impose certain duties upon a joint commission. We can take them away; there is not any question about that; but the question is whether we can take them away by an amendment to an appropriation bill. I doubt very much whether the amendment is open to the point of order which has been made.

Mr. MILLS. May I be permitted to say a word? My idea of an appropriation bill is that it carries the necessary annual appropriations to administer the Government under existing law, and everything outside of appropriations of money is general legislation. I think that is what it is intended to mean in the rule. The rule of the House of Representatives uses the term "existing law." It says that no amendment which changes existing law shall be in order on an appropriation bill. It means to confine the power in the Government to appropriate money to carry it on according to the laws established for the administration of the Government, and to exclude everything else.

Mr. CALL. The point of order has been made, but I ask unanimous consent to call attention to the fact that the proposition of the Senator from Texas can not be true upon its face. Does he mean to say that there must be a statute for everything for which the Senate and the House can appropriate money?

Mr. MILLS. Yes; unless you make the law as you go. You can not do it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Wherever there is law we are confined, as the Senator from Texas says, to carrying out the law.

Mr. CALL. But, then, the Constitution of the United States says that each House shall do what? Manage its own affairs and establish rules of procedure. What does that mean? Only where there is no money provided to carry it into execution? Is that it? Then, again, is the increase of the number of employés to carry out existing law to be provided by some previous statute? Is there no subject that the Congress of the United States, sitting as a legislative body, can appropriate for unless there is some precedent law, some authority or consent of an expired Congress?

Mr. MILLS. It can make the law.

Mr. CALL. An appropriation bill is just as much a legitimate method of making a law as any other measure. Is there any rule of the Senate which says that no amendment shall be made in pursuance of the legislative power vested in this body unless some previous Congress, according to the Senator from Texas, has authorized it? No action of any precedent Congress by the Constitution binds this body, and when the majority of the two bodies concur, by the Constitution of the United States and the supreme law of the land, whatever they do becomes the law, and no existing law can affect their action.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent to make one remark.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. If the position taken by the Senator from Texas is true, that any change of existing law is general legislation, then it is impossible for the Senate to make any amendment on an appropriation bill, because as soon as the amendment is made it becomes a law, and is therefore a change from existing law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the question, Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] in order? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is not received.

Mr. CALL. I move an amendment to come in at the same place as the former one. On page 13, line 24, I move to insert:

One clerk, at $2,500, for the service of the judges of the Supreme Court, to be employed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court for the service of the court in connection with the Law Library.

And then, in line 14, I move to reduce the number of assistant librarians from thirty to twenty-nine.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that that is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. That is the same point the Senate has already decided three times. The amendment proposes that the clerk shall be employed by the Chief Justice. The law I read declares that he shall be employed by the Librarian.

Mr. CALL. The amendment does not say anything about the Law Library. It has not any connection with it. It provides that a clerk may be appointed at $2,500 a year for the service of the Supreme Court in connection with the Law Library. Does the Senator from Maine say that any official of the Supreme Court who has any connection with the Law Library must be appointed by the Librarian?

Does he say that the marshal has connection with the Law Library, or any one who is sent by the Supreme Court to get the books of the Law Library? The Senator from Maine raises the point of order that the Judges of the Supreme Court can not send a man to the Law Library unless he is employed by the Librarian.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a decision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the question: Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida in order? [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CALL. I think we ought to have a yea-and-nay vote on this proposition. ["No!" "No!"] Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CALL. What is the status of the amendment?

Mr. MILLS. It was decided to be out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submitted the question to the Senate as to whether the proposed amendment is in order. He submitted it under the rules governing the body, and the Senate decides that the amendment is not in order. The bill is in the Senate, and still open to amendment.

Mr. CALL. I have another amendment to offer. On page 8, I move to strike out lines 19, 20, and 21, and insert:

For the care and maintenance of horses and vehicles used for carrying the mails and transportation required for the uses of the Senate, $3,500: Provided, That the offer of a responsible person shall be accepted, who shall give satisfactory bond and security to perform the service required by the Senate with the present outfit of horses and vehicles and with the use of the stables belonging to the Senate for one-third less than the cost in the fiscal year ending on the 1st of July, 1894.

I suppose this amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I believe I am bound, out of respect to the Constitution of the United States, to suggest that there is no quorum present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Davis,	Kyle,	Proctor,
Allison,	Dolph,	Lindsay,	Pugh,
Bate,	George,	McLaurin,	Quay,
Caffery,	Gibson,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Call,	Gorman,	Martin,	Roach,
Carey,	Hale,	Mills,	Sherman,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pasco,	Shoup,
Coke,	Hill,	Peffer,	Vest,
Cullom,	Jarvis,	Platt,	Voorhees,
Daniel,	Jones, Ark.	Power,	Walsh.

Mr. GEORGE. I call for announcement of the result of the roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is no quorum present.

Mr. BRICE entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. GEORGE. It is too late. I object to the Senator from Ohio answering after the announcement of the result.

Mr. PLATT. It is always in order to get a quorum.

Mr. HALE. Oh, certainly; it is in order for a Senator who enters the Chamber to answer to his name.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know from the Senator from Mississippi what he wishes to have done. I turn the business over to him. I should like to know what we are to do the rest of the day.

Mr. GEORGE. I have simply discharged my duty. The Senator need not turn any business over to me. However, I object to the name of the Senator from Ohio being called after the announcement of the result.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no quorum here. What would the Senator from Mississippi have the Senate do?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not care what the Senate does.

Mr. HALE. Unless the Senator from Missouri has another programme in mind I think at this hour, with the lack of a quorum——

Mr. COCKRELL. I had hoped to pass the pending bill and one other appropriation bill this evening, but as a matter of course we can not do it without a quorum; and now the Senate can do whatever it chooses.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. GEORGE. On that I call for a division.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 23, noes 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH entered the Chamber.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire whether the name of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] is recorded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is recorded. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. MARTIN. Has the name of the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] been called, and has he answered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not sought the recognition of the Chair. He will be recognized if he desires.

Mr. COCKRELL. Much as I may regret the necessity, it seems manifest that we shall not be able to finish the pending appropriation bill or to take up any other bill this evening. It would only be a punishment to ourselves to remain in session longer. Therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 16, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 14, 1894.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock m. by Hon. JAMES KERR, Clerk.

The CLERK. I have received the following communication from the Speaker pro tempore:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 14, 1894.

SIR: I hereby name the Hon. A. M. DOCKERY, a Representative from the State of Missouri, to perform the duties of the Chair for this day.

JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Speaker pro tempore.

Hon. JAMES KERR,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Missouri will please come forward and take the chair.

Mr. DOCKERY assumed the chair amid applause.

Prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

B. F. NORRIS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a copy of the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of B. F. Norris, deceased, against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE AT LEXINGTON, OKLA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (S. 320) authorizing the Purcell Bridge and Transfer Company to construct and maintain a bridge over the South Canadian River, at or within 1 mile of the town of Lexington, county of Cleveland, Territory of Oklahoma.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that bill for the present be allowed to remain on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

STATUE OF FRANCIS E. SPINNER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the Senate Joint Resolution No. 67 for the erection of a statue of Francis E. Spinner at the Treasury Department building in Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

FREE SCHOOLS AT OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6080) granting certain military reservations to Oklahoma City, Okla., to aid the public free schools thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Senate amendments be reported.

The Senate amendments were reported.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask a conference with the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced as conferees on the part of the House, Mr. MCRAE, Mr. HARE, and Mr. MOON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PIGOTT, for two days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BARTLETT, until Saturday, on account of sickness.
To Mr. COBB of Alabama, indefinitely, after to-day.
To Mr. CLARKE of Alabama, indefinitely, on account of important business.
To Mr. CABANISS, indefinitely.
To Mr. LACEY, for four days, on account of important business.
To Mr. MURRAY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

NATHANIEL G. SANFORD.

Mr. MEREDITH, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies papers in the case of Nathaniel G. Sanford, Fifty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MARY E. HAMILTON.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send up to the Clerk's desk, and if necessary will make a little statement in regard to it.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6417) to pension Mary E. Hamilton, widow of David Hamilton, soldier in Indian war of 1818.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension rolls and pay a pension of $12 per month to Mrs. Mary E. Hamilton, of Williamson County, Tenn., she being the widow of David Hamilton, who served in the Indian war of 1818.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RAY. One moment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted I would like to make a little statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Tennessee will be permitted to make a brief statement.

Mr. COX. This old lady lives in my town, the town of Franklin. She is about 70 years of age, a most excellent old lady, and the widow of a soldier who served in the war of 1818.

Mr. KILGORE. When did she marry this soldier? A long time after that war.

Mr. COX. I do not know when she married, they were so old. I do not know anything about that. She is just a good old woman, the widow of this soldier, and all the other soldiers in all the other Indian wars have been pensioned except that one. In the act passed by Congress those soldiers and their widows were not included; but all the rest of the survivors of the Indian wars and their widows have been pensioned.

Mr. KILGORE. I have not heard of that war of 1818.

Mr. COX. That is not my fault. [Laughter.] There was a war in 1818.

Mr. KILGORE. It is the fault of the historian in not making any record of that war.

Mr. COX. I am not here to defend the historian. There was a war in 1818; and all the records in this case came from the War Office. This is a most excellent old lady, pretty nearly in the grave. She is the widow of a soldier of that war, and all the other soldiers in those wars are now getting a pension at $12 a month.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Has this been considered in the Committee of the Whole at a Friday night session?

Mr. COX. Oh, no. The trouble about the Friday night sessions is that you can not get at a bill. I have been here every night, with one exception, since this Congress met trying to get a pension for this old lady, but have never been able to reach the bill on the Calendar. The committee in their report give all the facts in reference to the matter. I think she will die if we wait to get this pension through the Committee of the Whole at a Friday night session.

Mr. PICKLER. That is quite sure if she is over 25 years of age.

Mr. KILGORE. Have you been here every night looking after this matter?

Mr. COX. With a single exception, I have been here every night. Have you been here? [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. Well, most of the time.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. KILGORE. I do object.

Mr. COX. What, you object to this poor old woman?

Mr. KILGORE. I object to taking it up out of its order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Some time subsequently:

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas, who raised the objection a few moments ago to the bill I presented, has consented to withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas, the Chair is informed, withdraws his objection.

Mr. KILGORE. I did agree to abandon my objection in the matter, but I wish to make a brief statement if I can get consent to do so.

The complaint is made that these meritorious bills are not considered at the Friday night sessions. That is a very proper complaint, and the reason is that there is always thrust forward at these sessions some bill to relieve a man from the charge of desertion or a proposition that has no merit in it, according to the opinion of some gentlemen present, who are therefore disposed to antagonize the bill, and as a consequence block the whole business. When a bill of that character is insisted upon the result is naturally that the whole business is blocked by bills having no merit, while meritorious bills——

Mr. LOUD. I object, Mr. Speaker, to this mode of explanation.

Mr. KILGORE. Very well; I withdraw the objection to the request of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 3458) extending the time for final proof and payment on lands claimed under the public land laws of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 2015) granting to the Columbia Irrigation Company a right of way through the Yakima Indian Reservation in Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2055) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Duck River, in Humphreys County, Tenn.; and

A bill (S. 2139) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, from a point within the limits of the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, known as Eagle Point, to the opposite bank of said river, in the county of Grant and State of Wisconsin

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1919) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Yuma Indians in California, for the cession of their surplus lands, and for other purposes; and asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. ROACH, and Mr. PLATT, as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT DUBUQUE, IOWA.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have considered the bill I send to the desk, being for the construction of a high bridge in my own city.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River from a point within the limits of the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, known as Eagle Point, to the opposite bank of said river, in the county of Grant and State of Wisconsin.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The Committee on Interstate Commerce recommend certain amendments to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its present consideration.

The amendments were read at length.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendments agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADALINE J. PROPS.

Mr. TERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of bill the (H. R. 6228) granting a pension to Adaline J. Props.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I object.

MILITARY ROAD, EL PASO, TEX.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7419) for the construction of a military road from the city of El Paso to Fort Bliss, Texas.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to inquire if that bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I think there ought to be an explanation before that is given.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will make an explanation.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

CATHERINE CAINE.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considered the bill (H. R. 952) for the relief of Catherine Caine, and reported it back to the House with an amendment and with a favorable recommendation. I now ask unanimous consent that that bill may be acted upon by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to call the committees for reports.

PAVING STREETS, CHICAGO, ILL.

On motion of Mr. BLACK of Illinois, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5943) to pave the streets abutting on the Government property in Chicago to the middle line of said streets; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

BREVET COMMISSIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back as a substitute for House bill No. 4767 a bill (H. R. 7725) to repeal section 16 of the act making appropriations for the Army, approved July 15, 1870, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask that the minority of the committee have leave to file their views on this bill.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

BRIDGE BETWEEN MINNESOTA AND WISCONSIN.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 7518) to amend an act to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BRETZ. I ask that my colleague, Mr. CONN, be excused indefinitely, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, this request will be granted.

There was no objection.

REVENUE CUTTER SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The morning hour begins at twenty-eight minutes before 1 o'clock p. m.; and the call rests with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. WISE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pending bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BAILEY in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6723) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Cutter Service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that when the morning hour expired on Thursday last the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] had the floor. He is now entitled to resume the floor, and has forty minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not care to consume the time of the House. I have no desire in the world to make another speech about this bill; but I give warning to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that I am going to consume this forty minutes before this bill shall pass. Now, if they want to withdraw it and take up another, it is all right.

Mr. WISE. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that we have not the privilege without unanimous consent of withdrawing this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, ask unanimous consent.

Mr. WISE. And if we withdraw it, we have not the privilege under the rules of offering another bill without unanimous consent. If the House will give unanimous consent I will withdraw the bill; for if the gentleman from Missouri proposes to consume the time, it is useless to continue the consideration of the bill.

I am sorry, however, that the gentleman from Missouri has put himself in such a position. This is a bill recommended not only by the present Secretary of the Treasury but by many of his predecessors. They have informed this House that they believe a measure of this kind is necessary in order to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Cutter Service. I believe that it is. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have examined this subject carefully, and report to this House, as the result of their investigation, the recommendation that this bill pass.

Under such circumstances it seems to me that the gentleman from Missouri places himself certainly in an unenviable position when he announces that he will not permit a measure thus indorsed to be submitted to a vote of the representatives of the people. Under the circumstances, as the gentleman announces that he will not permit us to vote on this question, I will ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to withdraw this bill so as to present some others.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I object to the withdrawal of the bill.

Mr. WISE. Then we will consume the hour.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. BOWERS of California. And we will consume this hour for the rest of the session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, as I stated a few moments ago, I have no sort of desire to make another speech on this subject. The truth is I am not looking for opportunities to make speeches, especially when the mercury is ranging in the neighborhood of 100.

A MEMBER. And, besides, you have already got your nomination. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, I have got my nomination; and I will be elected, too. I am not uneasy about that.

My friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE], for whom I have a very high regard, seems to think that I am putting myself in an unenviable attitude by saying that the House shall not vote on this bill. I hope he has no feeling in the matter. I have not, I am sure.

Mr. WISE. None whatever, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I care nothing about seeming to other gentlemen to occupy an unenviable position. The sole question with me is this: "Is the position right?" If so, I take it and hold it.

I would be perfectly willing for the House to vote on this bill if I were "cock sure" the House would beat the bill. [Laughter.] There is nothing like being frank. I regard this as one of the worst bills ever introduced into this House, or that ever will be, the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] to the contrary notwithstanding. It will be cited in all the days to come as a precedent for wrongdoing.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, and I say it deliberately and after considering this matter since it was up here before, to see if I have made any mistake about it——

Mr. PENCE. With malice aforethought.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, you may say with malice aforethought, if you please. I say it deliberately, premeditatedly, willfully, that the American people are not ready to establish a pension system in this country from the civil service.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. This is not the civil service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a matter about which we differ. I have no animosity against any man in the Revenue Cutter Service. I do not know any man in it. I suppose that they are excellent gentlemen. Since this bill was up here day before yesterday some of my friends that belong to the third house have waited on me to instruct me as to the necessity and justice of this bill. They did not convince me. Let us see how the case stands, not only with reference to these men, but with reference to everybody else in the appointive departments of the Government. They are anxious to get these places.

There is no member of Congress here who does not spend hours of his time in undertaking to secure appointive places for his constituents. I do it, and everybody else does it. They are anxious to get the places. They receive good pay. They stay in them here for ten, fifteen, twenty, or thirty years, and then if they are bounced out they think that a crime has been committed.

I want to express another opinion while I am at it, and that is, that the civil-service system is the greatest and most monumental fraud ever adopted or proposed in a civilized country. [Applause.] The Commissioners are learned men and good citizens. They do the best they can to execute the law honestly. It is the system which is wrong. The best business men in the country would fail to pass. There are not ten men on the floor of this House who can stand a civil-service examination for a $900 clerkship.

Mr. MORGAN. Perhaps that is the fault of the men, not of the system. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, it is not the fault of the men, either. We could have stood these examinations once.

A MEMBER. I doubt it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When I was 14 or 15 years old I would have been willing to run the risk of grading 90 on any examination they can get up over there, but I can not do it now, because I have forgotten the things on which they examine people.

Mr. BOWERS of California. The most of us never knew them. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Maybe you never did, but the most of us did when we were younger. I will give you a sample of those examinations over there. At one examination it is said that they propounded this astonishing question:

How many British soldiers came over to America during the Revolutionary war?

One man answered that he did not know how many came over, but that a damned sight more came over than went home. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. They appointed him, did they not?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Has the gentleman any objection to stating what examination that was, and who the applicant was that had that question propounded to him, and made that answer?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not standing an examination, and that question is not pertinent to this discussion.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The point I make, Mr. Chairman, is this: I contend, for one, that the civil-service law of this country has come here to stay, and that it has improved the service of all the great departments of this Government. I take no stock in the statement that the gentleman makes about these examinations, and what I desire is, that if he makes such charges as these against this Commission, let him specify, so that we can go to the Civil Service Commission and there verify or refute the charges.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They do ask such questions. I do not care who it was or where he came from. I saw the statement in a newspaper, and believe it to be true.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The getleman declines to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Another question that was said to have been propounded was, how far it was from the earth to the sun. One man answered that he did not know how far it was, but that it was not far enough to keep him from drawing his salary if he got that place.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. WISE. Will you tell this House how far you have got from the question before the House? [Great laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you directly. You need not be uneasy about the question.

Mr. WISE. I am not uneasy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to give you another sample of it. About two weeks ago a man from my district whom I had never seen before, or heard of, and his wife came to my room to see me. They were in great perturbation of spirit. He said that he had been over here in one of the Departments for twenty-nine years as a clerk, having been appointed before I moved to Missouri, and that he had been notified that he had been discharged, or would be, on the 1st of July. I examined him as to his politics first. [Laughter.] He said he was a good Democrat. I asked him what pay he had been receiving. He had been getting from $1,000 up through the various grades for twenty-nine years.

I asked him how much money he had saved in the twenty-nine years. He said he had not saved a cent. I asked him when was the last time he went to Missouri to vote in that Congressional district. He said he had not set foot in that State for twenty-nine years. [Laughter]. I asked him his reasons for not going out in the world and getting another place. He said he did not know how to do anything else. That is the kind of citizens you are breeding under the civil-service system in this country. You take away from him the instincts of American citizenship.

Mr. BRETZ. And the individuality.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And the individuality.

A MEMBER. And self-reliance.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And self-reliance, and a disposition to save a dollar for a rainy day. They would not care to-morrow what became of republican institutions if the change raised their salaries.

Mr. PENCE. And saved their job.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I like to see Democrats in these offices, and if not Democrats, good fighting Republicans, or rancankerous Populists. [Laughter.] I have no use for an American who says he has no political opinions. He has no manhood. I like men who have principles and are ready to fight for them—men who entertain opinions and are not afraid to express them. Now, what do you do? You give them a life position. They do not undertake to save a dollar; and when they get too old for service they say the Government ought to support them. Such a theory runs counter to common sense and eternal right.

Now, I will come back to my real text. I am opposed to this bill. Not because it amounts to much per se, but the way this bill is rigged up, a dishonest man executing it might increase the waiting list of the Revenue Cutter Service ad infinitum. The men do not have to be 62 years old to be retired. They do not have to serve any length of time to be retired. The President can order a board to examine them to see if they are fit for service, and that board can retire a man, under this bill, at full pay at at 25 years of age, with three days' service, just as well as he can a man who is 62 years of age and who had served forty-five years.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. He can not be retired at full pay.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much?

Mr. MALLORY. At the same as on waiting orders, which is much less than full pay. It is the same ratio as in the Army and Navy.

Several MEMBERS. Three-fourths pay.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Three-fourths pay. That is better than the majority of the American people in long service get.

Mr. WASHINGTON. A pretty good life insurance.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A pretty fair life insurance, as the gentleman suggests. I repeat that it is not because this bill amounts to so much within itself, because there are comparatively few men in that service, and I take it that any President and any board of examiners will execute it honestly, but because it is the beginning of an indefensible system. Some committee came forward with a bill here not long ago to pension the police of this town. Well, now, if there is a soft job on the face of the earth I think it is belonging to the police system of this city. And somebody else suggested the pensioning of the clerks in the Departments.

If I had my way, a clerk would be appointed over there for four years, and then let him go back into the body of the people and imbibe some of their spirit of patriotism, economy, and self-reliance. It would do him a world of good to commune awhile with the taxpayers instead of the tax-eaters. And when one of them failed to go home to vote at two elections in succession, he should never be allowed to hold another office in this Government so long as he lived. [Laughter and applause.]

The judges of the United States courts holding by life tenure now retire on full pay after so many years of service on the bench, or on reaching the age of 70 years. It is a soft snap for the judges, but rather tough on the people who are not judges.

That is done, as all such things are done, on the pretext that they can not save anything out of their salaries, and unless so provided for they will hang on to their positions after they are disqualified by age or disease—all of which is a curious commentary on their sense of honor and justice.

Now, gentlemen, I want to warn you that in this business, as in many others, experience tells us, "Give them an inch and they will take an ell." You can not pass this bill and then come in the next time and say, "We did that, but we will not do this." Take this step and you must go the whole distance. The only safety lies in refusing to take the first step.

But it is said this Revenue Cutter Service is not a part of the civil service.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that our large cities like Chicago, New York, and Boston pension their firemen and policemen?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care anything about that; I am not speaking for those cities. Because Chicago or New York does a thing, it is no reason why we should follow their example.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The point I am making is this: That where the people have a voice in this matter and they find that a faithful employé reaches a point where he can not take care of himself, they take care of him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, now, in the first place the people do not have any astonishing amount of voice about what happens in New York or Chicago, where the city council is running affairs. [Applause.] In the next place, how much more faithful service do these people render than the bulk of people render? How does it happen that a man is entitled to an extra "soft snap" in his old age because he has been in the Government employ during the prime of his life, and at better wages than he could get anywhere else?

Mr. WISE. I hope my friend will allow me to call his attention to some of the facts of this case, because he ought to know the facts when he is talking about this thing. He speaks of our creating a waiting order list.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. WISE. Now, is the gentleman aware of the fact that there is such a list now?

A MEMBER. There ought not to be.

Mr. WISE. Wait a moment. Let us take the facts as they are. Gentlemen are trying to create the impression in this House that this bill is to accomplish something that does not now exist. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to look at the report, and he will find that there are now thirty-four officers in this service on waiting orders. So that we already have a waiting-order list. The only effect of this bill is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to give promotion to younger and more active men, who can render better service to the Government in whose employ they are now engaged. That is the whole bill.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman point out the law that allows the Secretary of the Treasury to put these men on the waiting-order list and thereby virtually retire them?

Mr. WISE. There is no law——

Mr. WASHINGTON rose.

Mr. WISE. Wait a minute. These men can not now perform duty——

Mr. BRETZ. Why pay them, then?

Mr. WISE. They are disabled by age or disease. There is one man in this service who is now 94 years of age. Nothing can be done with such a man except to retire him or leave him on waiting orders. He can not perform active duty.

Mr. WASHINGTON. One other question. Is not this civil employment?

Mr. WISE. No, sir.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Why not?

Mr. WISE. For the reasons that have already been explained.

Mr. WASHINGTON. These officers are under the Treasury Department.

Mr. WISE. They are under the Treasury Department only for convenience, because their duties relate to the collection of the revenue, of which subject the Treasury Department has control. But these officers are subject to military duty in war; and I will say to the gentleman that one of these officers who is to be put on this waiting order list is a man who served on the Monitor in the contest down here in Hampton Roads during the late war. These men now on waiting orders are there because they can not be anywhere else.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, one of two thinks is true: Either those men are on waiting orders under the law or they are on waiting orders without any law. If they are on waiting orders without law, they ought to be taken off; if they are on waiting orders under the law, the law ought to be repealed.

If these men are in a quasi naval position, what is the reason they do not go into the Navy?

Mr. MILLIKEN. If they should go into the Navy they could not render this revenue marine service; they could not serve in both capacities at once.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you the reason. They do not want to go into the Navy, because they have a softer job and an easier time where they are than they would have in the Navy.

Mr. BOWERS of California and Mr. MILLIKEN. That is a mistake.

Mr. MALLORY. I have here a list of officers who have been appointed from the Navy to this service. There are twelve officers in the Revenue Cutter Service who were appointed as such after graduation at the United States Naval Academy, having completed the six-years course. Six officers now in the Revenue Marine Service were cadets at the Naval Academy prior to their appointment as cadets in this service. These officers graduated from the school-ship of the Revenue Cutter Service after serving the probationary term and successfully passing all examinations, six in number.

There is a school-ship on which they have to serve before they are admitted to this service at all, and before they graduate from the Naval Academy they must pass an additional examination on that school-ship. The Government does not permit them to go into the Navy directly. Every member present knows that of each graduating class at Annapolis a certain number do not enter the Navy at all, but have leave, if they so desire, to quit the service and enter some other profession. But those who do enter the service must pass this additional examination.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That would apply also to those who wished to enter the profession of teachers, or anything of that kind; they would have to submit to an examination.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; but I am merely calling the attention of the gentleman from Missouri, in answer to an inquiry, as to why these men do not go into the Navy, for the purpose of showing him that there is no room for them in the Navy. Every time a class graduates from the Naval Academy a large number of the graduating cadets are not permitted to enter the Navy, although they are entirely qualified for it, because there is no room for them. It is not because the Navy is a harder berth than this Revenue Cutter Service. I claim to know something of it myself, and I believe it to be true that the men render very much more arduous service in the Revenue Cutter Service in time of peace than the Naval officers render under similar conditions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, Mr. Chairman, that opens up a very wide field that might be discussed at considerable length. It seems, from the drift of the gentleman's statement, that one of the objects of the Revenue Cutter Service is to provide places for the overflow from the Naval Academy—the surplus after six years of free education at the expense of the Government.

I want to make one remark about that. The Government does not educate young men at Annapolis and West Point especially for the benefit of the young men themselves. It educates them for the benefit of the people. Certainly after it has given a young man a free education of six years at Annapolis and five, I think it is, at West Point the Government of the United States is under no sort of obligation to do anything more for him except for its own good; and if a young man is not fit to go out into the world after six years' education at Annapolis and fight his way with our children in this country, why the best thing you could do with him is to take him out and drown him after he gets his graduation papers. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. After the Government has educated a young man under these circumstances, has given him a proper education and fitted him for the naval service or for service in the Army, is it not to the interest of the Government to keep him in that service, and in the line of duty for which he has been educated, improving him all the time, so that he is ready for duty under the Government in any emergency and can render the country efficient service?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is that your question?

Mr. RAY. That is a part of it. I say is it not to the benefit of the Goverment to keep that young man where the service he can render to the Government may be accessible and useful after he has received this education at the expense of the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir; it is not.

I will give you an illustration that will prove my position beyond all controversy. You take the roll call of the great generals of the last war on both sides, the West-Pointers, and see where they were when the war began. With a single exception, that of Gen. Lee on the Confederate side, and Thomas and Hancock on the Federal side, they were in civil life.

Mr. MORGAN. And Sheridan.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And not a single, solitary great commander on either side, as I believe or remember, was in the service of the Government when the war began, with those exceptions.

Mr. MALLORY. Sidney Johnston was.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And Hardee.

A MEMBER. How about McClellan?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, all these men are not all great generals, let me give you the pointer.

Gen. Grant was in the mercantile business in the town of Galena, Ill.

Mr. RAY. But all of these men did become great generals after their graduation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just wait until I answer your first question.

Mr. RAY (continuing). After their graduation they served in the Army or Navy in the service of the Government for a long term of years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, just wait a moment. Some of them got out of it just as soon as they could.

Albert Sidney Johnston, who, excepting Stonewall Jackson, was probably the greatest man, after Lee, in the Confederate service—because I believe that Stonewall Jackson was the greatest soldier that ever set foot on this continent—Albert Sidney Johnston was a great commander. He had been out of the service of the Government and down on the frontier in the army of the Republic of Texas——

A MEMBER. And made a good one.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, he was a good soldier, and only got back into the United States service a little while before the war began. So, take them all up one side and down the other, and the statement that I have made is practically true. Gen. Sherman, who ranks next in history with Grant, although not in merit, was teaching school somewhere down in Louisiana when the war began, and before that he had been trying to practice law in Kansas and failed.

Mr. MALLORY. What kind of a school was he teaching?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, a so-called military school. I do not know exactly what else was taught. Stonewall Jackson had been teaching in the Military Institute of Virginia and running a Sunday school in Lexington, and when the war began he was made a colonel, and the people who knew him said he did not have sense enough to command a regiment. [Laughter.] But they changed their opinion after Bull Run, Front Royal, and the second Manassas. Now, going back a little in the discussion, I do not see how going back into the civil walks of life would deprive a cadet graduated from Annapolis or from West Point of the training that makes him a soldier.

Mr. RAY. Now, may I interrupt you there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just let me complete one more sentence. Although I do not pretend to know much about naval affairs, I believe that a graduate of Annapolis would see more of sea service and learn more about seamanship in the commercial navy of the world than he would in this Revenue Cutter Service.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman tell me why he comes to that conclusion?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I conclude that a man commanding one of these great ocean steamers would certainly cross the Atlantic once in a while and become familiar with its geography; but if he is in the revenue service, while he may get pretty tolerably familiar with the coast and the inlets and the mouths of rivers, he will never learn very much about the great ocean and its geography. And if his Annapolis training fits him for sea life, he can always secure remunerative employment in the merchant marine.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now, will my friend allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. When a seaman has become acquainted with the coast of the Atlantic Ocean he is acquainted with all he wants to know practically, because there is no danger of his running ashore out in the middle of the ocean. Now, my friend stated the other day that one of the reasons why the officers in the revenue marine were not in any danger was because they never got a thousand miles from land.

Now, I do not think it would ever occur to anyone who had learned his seamanship anywhere except upon the broad prairies of the West, that a man could not drown anywhere except a thousand miles out in the ocean. If the gentleman is acquainted at all with the sea, as he evidently is from his remarks and his discussion of the question—I have no doubt he is an old sailor from the way he talks—if he is acquainted with the sea, he knows that the greatest danger is not in the middle of the ocean, but that it is near the shore, for two reasons.

In the first place, when you get upon soundings, the sea is very much worse than it is in the middle of the ocean, because that is where you get the short chops; and then again you know, and so does everyone who has taken pains to become informed about the matter, that where one ship is foundered at sea there are a hundred that are wrecked on the rocks and the reefs on the shore, so that the position which my friend takes, that a man does not learn anything about seamanship, and that he is in no danger until he gets a thousand miles away from land, is an incorrect position, and if the gentleman will consult his experience upon the ocean he will find it to be untrue, and will change his mind.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not exactly catch the point of the gentleman's question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman evidently wants to take up the time, and I will help him a little. The gentleman says he did not catch the point, because the point was very plain and easy to be caught. But this is true, and I am speaking seriously now, for I know something about it—I have lived on the sea all my life, and I know something about the Revenue Marine Service—I know that on the coast of New England the hardships of the men engaged in this service are perhaps as great as those of any sailors who sail the sea except the fishermen who go out in the winter to catch fish on the Banks. Of course they suffer the most hardships of any sailors, but in the wintertime these men in the Revenue Cutter Service are engaged all the time in getting ice out of harbors and in rendering all sorts of assistance, and they are in more continuous useful service in time of peace than the men in the Navy are.

Mr. WISE. I see my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has taken his seat. If he has yielded the floor, I should like to take it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The question to be decided here is whether these men who are upon waiting orders shall be retired and so get out of the way, or whether they shall stay in their positions and keep young and active men from promotion, or whether you shall discharge them.

Why should they not stand in the same position as officers in the Navy? They perform substantially all the service. A captain in the Navy gets about $4,000 a year, while a captain in the Revenue Marine Service gets $2,500, and it will be a fairer thing to discharge a captain in the Navy when he gets to that age where he is unfitted for active service than it would be to discharge a man in the Revenue Marine Service. I say there is no ocean service as useful as that of the Revenue Marine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has expired.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to consume any more time than is absolutely necessary with reference to some few of the points that were made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. It seems to me that the gentleman from Missouri misconceives the object and purpose of this measure. He seems to think its purpose is to benefit especially the individuals composing the Revenue Cutter Service. In reality, the object of the measure is to promote the efficiency of the service.

We have a service which even the gentleman from Missouri will not deny is necessary to the proper conduct of this Government. It is absolutely essential that our coast should be guarded by vessels and men qualified and properly equipped to guard against infractions of the revenue laws of the country; and if it is necessary that such a service should exist, it is certainly equally necessary that the service should be kept efficient.

Now, the condition of this service at the present day is this: These officers are appointed on the recommendation of the President and are confirmed by the Senate. They are appointed for life. They receive commissions which authorize them to act in the capacities to which they are appointed; and it is not in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury nor in the power of the President of the United States, or of anyone else, to remove them from their positions. Now, in the course of time, by reason of the hardship and exposure to which they are subjected, these men, earlier in life, perhaps, than ordinary men, become incapacitated to bear the hardships.

Mr. HUTCHESON. What is the death rate?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know what the death rate is.

Mr. HUTCHESON. They could resign.

Mr. MALLORY. So might the officers of the Navy.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Do they ever die or resign?

Mr. MALLORY. That brings me to the point which the gentleman from Missouri seems to have entirely ignored. The gentleman seems to think that you can pick up a man anywhere in the United States and put him in the command of a vessel. He says that there are hundreds and thousands looking around for such a job, who would jump in and fill any one of these vacancies. That is not so.

It is just as essential that the gentlemen who are appointed to these positions should be qualified to take charge of a ship as it is that a naval officer should be able to do so. You recognize that by requiring a naval officer to go through a long novitiate before he receives a commission of the Government, and the same thing is required of these officers. They are required to pass an examination in seamanship; and it is necessary for them to devote all the best years of their lives to studying the phenomena of the ocean and meeting the obstructions and difficulties that they may encounter in their calling. They are thoroughly skilled navigators, a thing which I am free to say that three-fifths of the masters of merchant vessels outside of the mercantile fleet of the United States are not.

They have to be competent navigators and devote their whole time to the study of this peculiar pursuit; and I am sure that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is too kind hearted a man, and has too much common sense, and I am sure he appreciates what is necessary under such circumstances too strongly to contend that after these men have devoted all their time and all their lives, you may say, to equip themselves adequately for the performance of their duties, the Government of the United States, at the moment that they become incapacitated, at the moment that they are unable to take care of themselves, should turn them out on the cold charities of the world.

Surely that is why we have a retired list for the Army and for the Navy. That is the only reason for it; and I say if there is a reason for our establishing a retired list for the Army and for the Navy, then it is certainly just as strong in the case of the revenue service. As I undertook to show the other day, the only difference there is between this service and the Navy is the fact that this Revenue Cutter Service is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. In addition to that, while this bill will not pass to-day probably, but inasmuch as I purpose to endeavor to get it through this Congress, notwithstanding the opposition that has manifested itself, I will avail myself of the opportunity of calling attention to the language of the Secretaries of the Treasury upon this subject.

As I said the other day in my remarks, the Secretaries of the Treasury have most warmly indorsed this measure. Mr. Boutwell in 1872 indorsed it; Mr. Richardson subsequently to him, and Mr. Folger again made a strong and striking appeal for some such measure; and the present Secretary of the Treasury, in addressing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in response to a request for his views on the subject, used this language:

> The necessities of the service are constantly increasing, while its effective force is constantly decreasing, and unless some remedy is provided by Congress the time can not be very far distant when the Secretary of the Treasury will be compelled to seriously consider the propriety of discharging a number of superannuated and infirm officers in order to fill their places with others who are competent to discharge the duties of the positions which they now hold. Two of the officers now on the "waiting orders" list have been connected with the service more than sixty years, and several of them have served more than thirty years. They were appointed for life, and it would be a great hardship to drop them out of the service after they have become old and infirm without making some provision for them. They are now receiving the same pay from the Government that they would receive if the proposed bill should become a law, and we have in fact, therefore, a retired list, or "waiting orders" list, but without authority of law to fill the places of the officers who compose it.

They stand there really on the active list, on awaiting orders. The result is that the younger officers, below them, can not be promoted to the positions held by these elderly, superannuated, and incapacitated officers; and therefore the efficiency of the service is deteriorated thereby.

> No such condition exists or can exist in any other branch of the public service, and in my opinion the proposed bill, or some measure of a similar character, should be passed by Congress in order to place this very useful part of the customs force upon an efficient basis.
> I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
> J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Now, there are in this service two hundred and eleven officers. Of those two hundred and eleven, thirty-four are on waiting orders. The bill does not authorize an increase of the active force at all. It simply proposes to take these thirty-four incapacitated men and put them on the waiting-order list, giving them waiting-orders pay and thereby enabling vacancies to be created in the positions which they hold, authorizing the promotion of younger officers who are now filling subordinate positions. It does not increase the force of the revenue service in any particular, and simply is a common-sense measure when you come to understand it, which provides for the promotion of those men, who are now in the prime of life, to the command of vessels which are now in their command but held by them in a subordinate position.

In other words, a first lieutenant is practically and actually commanding a vessel, and the captain, who ought to be in command, is superannuated now, and not doing any duty. In addition to this, I will say that the officers are competent men. They are subjected to rigid examinations before they enter the service, such examinations as the cadets of Annapolis are subjected to. They are required to be on a school ship for two years, and even if they have been at Annapolis, they are compelled to go through that course. They have to study navigation; they have to study steam engineering; they have to become thoroughly familiar with duties aboard ship, with methods of navigating vessels under unfavorable circumstances.

It seems to me no intelligible reason can be urged against this measure. If it is the intention of Congress to allow this service to deteriorate and become inefficient, the method which has been pursued in the years gone by will undoubtedly accomplish that result; but if it is the purpose of Congress to raise this service to a level of efficiency comparable to the efficiency of our Navy, then a measure of this kind ought to be adopted. If the Cutter Service is unnecessary, abolish it; if it is necessary, make it efficient.

This service is not a sanctuary for incompetent young men who have failed to obtain office by reason of their attendance at Annapolis. The examination for this service is just as rigid as the examination at Annapolis. Equally thorough knowledge and equally difficult and responsible duties are required of these officers as are required of officers of the Navy.

It will not do for the gentleman from Missouri to undertake to point to the fact that there were many officers of the Army, distinguished for their service in the late war, who at the outbreak of the war had been pursuing the ordinary peaceful avocations of life, for that is not a parallel case. I would like the gentleman to point out any individual who rose to prominence in the Navy during the war who had not gone through a long training to prepare him for the duties of that service, and who was not actually in the Navy at the outbreak of the war. If there were any such they have escaped my memory. The duties of these revenue officers are analogous to those of naval officers, not to those of army officers.

Now, in this service to-day there are among the captains seventeen who served in the Navy during the late war. Among the first lieutenants there are twenty-six who served in the Navy during the late war. Of second lieutenants (these being a younger set of men), there are two; and there is one third lieutenant. Among the twenty-six chief engineers in the service there are fourteen who served in the Navy during the war. There are ten first assistant engineers who served in the war, and two second assistant engineers. Out of two hundred and eleven officers in this service there are to-day seventy-two who served in the Navy during the war. In addition to these, there are twelve who are graduates at Annapolis, and six who, though they did not graduate at Annapolis, nevertheless attended the Naval Academy for a number of years, passed the examinations required for the revenue service, and upon such examinations were admitted as officers in that service.

Mr. COX. I would be glad if my friend would yield for a question. I wish to find out whether I understand this proposition correctly. When these men enter this service they have to undergo an examination?

Mr. MALLORY. They have to spend two years on a school ship.

Mr. COX. But they have to go through an examination, and when they go into the service they go in for life?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Now, your proposition is that when they reach a certain age——

Mr. MALLORY. When they become superannuated or incapacitated.

Mr. COX. Yes; when they become incompetent, that then they be retired on pay, and others put in their places in the service. Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. MALLORY. Not that others shall be appointed in their places, but that junior officers shall be promoted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is the same thing, as others have to take the place of the junior officers.

Mr. MALLORY. Not necessarily; there is a superabundance of junior officers.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then there are more men in this service than there ought to be.

Mr. MALLORY. It is expressly provided in the bill that the number shall not be increased.

Mr. COX. Now, when these men, on account of age or for any other reason, prove incompetent to discharge their duties, they having entered the service for life, the Government has no way of dismissing them?

Mr. MALLORY. No, sir.

Mr. COX. And you propose to put them on what you call the waiting-order list?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; the same as now, except that we open the door for promotion.

Mr. COX. Then it means that they shall be put upon a retired list on full pay?

Mr. MALLORY. No; on reduced pay.

Mr. COX. But it is a retired list at last?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. And the only other way the Government could be relieved of them is by a law authorizing their dismissal?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; that is the only way.

Mr. COX. Then it looks like a mere proposition to substitute a retired list for a waiting-orders list.

Mr. MALLORY. Practically that is all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report this bill to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MALLORY, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. CLARK of Missouri)—ayes 44, noes 32.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MALLORY and Mr. CLARK of Missouri were appointed.

Before the count by tellers was concluded, the morning hour expired, when the committee rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BAILEY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6723) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Cutter Service, had come to no resolution thereon.

LAND TITLES, OREGON AND WASHINGTON.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the bill H. R. 69.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report was read at length.

Mr. PAYNE. Let us have the statement accompanying this report read.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the title of this bill has not been read. We do not understand what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill prescribing limitations of time for completion of title to certain lands disposed of under the act of Congress approved September 27, 1850, and the acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, and commonly known as the "donation act," and for the protection of purchasers and occupants of said lands.

Mr. PAYNE. Let the statement be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that there is no written statement accompanying the report.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the conferees, by an oversight, failed to submit a written statement; but there is no substantial change between the bill as it passed the House and the amendments made by the Senate, and if permitted to do so I can make a brief statement explanatory of the report.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the report had better be withheld until the statement is prepared.

Mr. McRAE. If that be insisted upon, I withdraw the report for the present.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order on the report.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is this the land-grant forfeiture bill?

Mr. McRAE. Oh, no; it is a bill relating only to certain land titles in Oregon and Washington, under what is known as the "donation act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Arkansas making a verbal statement in place of a written statement?

Mr. TRACEY. I think the rules of the House had better be complied with.

Mr. McRAE. Then I withdraw the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report is withdrawn.

IMMIGRATION AND CONTRACT LABOR LAWS.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, laid before the House on Monday last, transmitting, pursuant to House resolution of June 7, 1894, information relative to the rules and regulations established in connection with the administration of the immigration and contract labor laws.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to have this printed in the form of a document?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir; in document form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection the order to print this communication in document form will be made.

There was no objection.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE GEORGE W. HOUK.

Mr. OUTHWAITE (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order, fixed for to-day at 2 o'clock, begin now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 14th day of July next, beginning at 2 o'clock p. m., be set apart for eulogies on the late George W. Houk.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I offer the resolutions I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of the Hon. George W. Houk, lately a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these proceedings to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I now yield to my colleague, Mr. SORG.

Mr. SORG. Mr. Speaker, as I arise to add tributes of respect to the memory of the departed Mr. Houk, my mind reverts to the evening when the people who loved him for his worth were given the sad message that he had passed into the shadows.

Could I now give utterance to the thoughts welled up by saddened hearts on that fateful night, the memory of the deceased would be dressed in the choicest garlands. The tenderest sentiments expressed now in the choicest of rhetorical gems are inadequate to convey the sorrow felt at that moment, when the very mantle of death hung darkly over us. In the anguish of sincere grief those who had felt the influence of his sympathy and friendship sent up a prayer for the soul of the dead and the comfort of his loved ones.

George W. Houk was born in the mountains of Cumberland County, Pa, September 25, 1825. His mother was a lady of intellectual rather than romantic inclinations, and was ambitious for a more inspiring location in which to rear her children. When the youngest child, George, was but 2 years old the family crossed the mountains and came to Ohio, locating at Dayton, where Mr. Houk always lived. His alertness of intellect gave him preëminence in school life. An academic training and the study of law enabled him to equip himself with such a fund of legal knowledge that he was admitted to the bar of his county when he was but 21 years old.

Early in life he was elected a member of the Ohio Legislature, and though associated with many leading political figures, his intellect shone with an effulgence that was not dimmed by his surroundings. Despite his youth he was made chairman of the judiciary committee, which position he filled with honor to himself and credit to his county. With the expiration of his legislative term he retired from public life and its attendant cares.

In 1856 he married happily, his wife being Miss Eliza Thruston, and in the congenial duties of his chosen profession and the quiet pleasures of his country home he looked back to his public life with no thought of regret that he had severed from it. In 1860 Mr. Houk was sent as a delegate to the Charleston-Baltimore convention, remaining throughout its deliberations a strong adherent of Stephen A. Douglas. In 1876 he was a delegate to the national Democratic convention held at St. Louis. In 1884 he was chosen a district elector. In 1890 he again entered public life by his election to Congress, and in 1892 he was returned by an abnormal majority.

Prior to his Congressional life, in his profession he ranked as one of the leading practitioners of his State. For nineteen years he was associated with the Hon. John A. McMahon, that gifted orator of the Miami. His life in Congress, though brief, as compared to the extended services of some of my distinguished colleagues, was not without feature. The bold, incisive fight made by him for the soldiers during the life of the Fifty-second Congress has endeared him to their hearts forever. The attempt to have the pension of every inmate of a soldiers' home reduced to $5 a month will be easily recalled by those familiar with Congressional matters.

Soon after the measure was reported to the House, Mr. Houk secured a record of the disabilities of the veterans at the home near Dayton, Ohio, and so vigorously did he combat the bill that it was defeated. For years the Government had shown grateful appreciation, and it would have been cruel and unjust in the very evening of life to cloud their last days with such evidences of ingratitude. Grateful wives and children of helpless soldiers looked upon him as their protector, and thanked Heaven for a life such as his. With the soldiers of Ohio to-day the memory of George W. Houk stands as a monument erected by his grateful beneficiaries.

It was my pleasure to form the acquaintance of Mr. Houk during the fall of 1890, and though the affiliation grew out of political combat the character of the man commanded my profound admiration at once. Always manly, with a pronounced contempt for chicanery and sinister methods, he won the esteem of even those whom he opposed in political warfare. During all of his public career, in the heat of contests when the character of man is often seared before the fires of partisan animosity, never was there a chapter of his life unfolded which drew out a blush from the man who had molded it.

In personal appearance Mr. Houk was commanding and distinguished, blessed with a tall, massive form within which were those characteristics which displayed a nature as warm as Heaven's own sun rays. His cordiality of address, his warm greeting, his sympathetic and cheerful companionship made him a favorite among all. He loved his friends, and none was fonder of his home and its social environments than was he. His hospitable hearth was a favorite rendezvous for those he loved. With an inexhaustive fund of anecdote and illustration and the grace and suavity of a polished gentleman he entertained on these occasions as few could. Underlying every thought and expression was a vein of humor, and without him social gatherings at his home city were lacking one of their most pleasant features. He was a vital adjunct to the very life of his native place. The bar regarded him as one of its patriarchs and pillars. His party looked to him as the nucleus of their organization, and the city honored him for his worth and integrity as a citizen.

As a scholar Mr. Houk took rank with the foremost, and had his love for books been less greater preëminence would have been attained. In later years, when the fires of youthful ambition had grown low, he buried himself in his library, and with his books he wandered back through blissful channels with his seeming friends—the authors and historians of other days.

There in his home, towering sublimely above the busy city, he feasted on the beauties of nature as presented by the panoramic scenes of the famous Miami Valley and enjoyed the fond companionship of his books.

Indeed, it has often been said that he sat in his library as contented as a civic or military hero, and viewed the remorseless, selfish struggles of mankind with the contemptuousness of a philosopher. He had a passionate fondness for poetry, philosophy and history, and the heroic figures associated with the life of the world found him almost their worshiper. The memory of Lincoln he regarded as one of the tenderest of America's treasures, and his lecture on the life of the first martyred President was a stalwart effort. As a speaker he was commanding, but his genius shone greater as a writer. With a capacious mind replete with beautiful thoughts, and with a skillful command of language, he rounded up his sentences with fascinating beauty and euphony.

When but a mere boy he attacked the leading actors of political life; not with the diffidence of an untrained opponent, but with the skill of a young premier; not with the trepidation of a boy, but with the incisiveness of a trained statesman. He diagnosed the questions a few years prior and subsequent to the Mexican war, and criticised some of the Whig leaders with such effect that old Governor Anderson of Ohio said:

> To think a boy just out of his teens detecting the animus of that controversy and seeing the points upon which Bob Schenck and I split.

Mr. Houk's state papers are held as the efforts of one familiar with every epoch of American history. All contemporaneous questions elicited from him opinions and criticisms which did much to mold public sentiment in his district and in other parts of the country. As a private citizen he did much for the promotion and advancement of his State. He was a member of the constitutional convention to frame for it a new constitution, and was one of the incorporators of the public library at Dayton.

When at last his party was brought from a helpless minority in his district and he was sent to this body, he came with mature thought and experience, and conservatism rather than ostentation attended his career in Congress. His high character as a man you all knew, and his integrity of purpose is seen from his attitudes on absorbing questions.

Mr. Houk had no premonition of death.

During the morning of his last day on earth he sent to Western friends messages of that felicitation ever characteristic of him. The last week when he was treading in the very shadows of another world he was laboring with a tariff speech which had been well-nigh completed. On the afternoon of February 9, 1894, he left his desk with the remark that excessive labor was telling on his vitality and that he would grant himself a respite. A half hour later and the death angel had brought that decree from heaven, and he had passed the breakers of another shore.

Died in the service of his country, rich in triumphs and good deeds, beloved by his friends, admired by his enemies; and though dead, his memory will remain a strange, sweet perfume, ever to be cherished by those to whom he was endeared.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the resolution of my friend from Ohio, and to pay tribute to the memory of Judge G. W. Houk, whose acquaintance I made in the early days of the Fifty-second Congress.

In the progress of legislation I had frequent occasion to appear before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which Judge Houk was a member in the Fifty-second Congress, and, in presenting arguments for and against bills considered by that committee, I soon learned to regard him as one whose opinions carried great weight. He gave to the members appearing before the committee patient attention, and by intelligent inquiry sought to bring out important facts, thereby assuring them that the merits of their bills should be fully considered.

In his appearance before committees on which I served, his clear and concise statement of the bills he came to advocate won the respectful consideration as well as the entire approval of their members. I found him an industrious and painstaking member in performing the work of the committee on which we both served. It was, however, in the House, in the Committee of the Whole, that he best appeared.

In running debate, or in the set speech, he disclosed a strong understanding, comprehensive knowledge, and careful research, so that he enlightened the House by his arguments, always clothed in words expressive, clear, and strong. He interested the House by his rich store of information, and won its attention by his easy and graceful style, unaffected by studied ornaments of oratorical art, and was never wanting in that unfailing courtesy which characterized his intercourse with others. He was a master of correct, concise expression. His sentences were clear, his arguments direct, and all his speeches furnished convincing proof of his great learning, as shown in his remarks on all the important measures before the House.

There was no member in his first term who spoke on more of the leading measures before the House, or discussed them with greater vigor and intelligence than Judge Houk, whether it was the adoption of the rules, the silver question, the Navy, Army, Post-Office, or sundry civil appropriation bills; the rivers and harbors; the Soldiers' Home; the Columbian Exhibition; public printing; street railroads in the District; the regulation of the sale of tobacco by the producers; the statistics of the colored race and its upward progress in acquiring cultivation and wealth, or the tariff. In all his efforts he illustrated the advantages of a thorough knowledge of law. In every public effort he gave convincing proof of his intimate acquaintance with "that science which," it has been said "does more to quicken and invigorate the understanding than all the other kinds of learning put together." He practiced law at the bar of his own State for nearly fifty years, rising to the front rank. Here he quickly came to be recognized as one of the ablest lawyers of the House.

It was not my good fortune to have known Judge Houk in other relations than those pertaining to membership in this body, and I knew him only as I met him in committees and on the floor. Upon all the great political questions we differed, but outside of those questions upon which parties divide, I counted myself fortunate in agreeing with him, for I know he had brought to their consideration large experience, sound judgment, and great legal acumen. He had a marked and interesting personality, a thorough acquaintance with public affairs, and a happy combination of those qualities of head and heart which made him a safe adviser, an agreeable companion, and a valued friend.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, thousands of years ago the man of Uz said, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God."

It was the declaration of humanity's longing for immortality. And the wisest and best of the race have never departed from the belief that this was a probationary state, and that immortality awaited those whose career here was well run.

If any other view pertained, if there was conviction that with the end of what we call life came absolute cessation of all intellectuality and of spiritual existence, if we believed that all there was of Cæsar was in the ashes shut up in his urn, that all there was of Bonaparte was under the dome of the Invalides in Paris, if all there was of the Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief was that which had been laid away in the sepulcher, if all that is of those we have known and loved is a clod in the valley, a handful of unrecognizable dust, such ceremonies as these we are now indulging in would be the idlest and most mocking of performances.

But as surely as the influences of men go abroad and dwell after them, so surely it seems to me that we who are indulging in these mournful rites do so in the presence of an assemblage which has marched over the stage of human action, and which from its proper abode is observing that which we say and do here; and with that belief, what we say here of our departed companion and friend should be truthful and wise and kind.

I hardly know why I should have been designated from among the many who have served with him longer than I have, to speak of him, unless it is because of the fact that our lives have been together outside of this Hall to a certain extent, and that I am able to bear some testimony of the quieter life of the man.

I met him in the busy scenes of his own city, and after that in the lovely home which has been adverted to by the gentleman who succeeded him. Occupying as it did a commanding place upon the bluffs of the Miami, from its windows and doors the city of Dayton stretches beneath, with its hundreds of industries and its teeming thousands of population, with its smoke, and its roar, and its ceaseless activities; and yet, although a great figure in that community, within the doors of his home it seemed as if everything was shut out except the life of the family and the man.

It seemed as though one had stepped into the sylvan abodes of the past, and that there was no envy, no contention, and no bitterness possible where he sought his retreat. A wife who loved and adored him, and children who followed him into his quiet, were there, perpetually making the music and the sunshine of happy life within his abode. And through and over it all, in its shadows and its sunshines, there was the undoubted evidence that the spirit of amity, of affection, and of mutual regard inspired the domestic life. There could be no more beautiful scene than that exhibited in the abode of the deceased.

Following him to Washington, his wife—and they were both stricken in years—dwelt with him in all of the trials and labors and triumphs of his honored service in his Congressional career. I was walking through Judiciary Square one day, and turning one of the bends, caught sight of the lengthening vista of a path just being shadowed from the sun by the budding foliage. At a distance that did not enable me to recognize the figures I saw a man and a woman, in lover fashion, sitting on one of the benches, too much engaged with each other to notice my approach.

As I came nearer I recognized Judge Houk and his wife, and jesting with them about their engagement, they told me that they had been reviving the associations, the memories, and the happiness of their youth, and were courting again as they had done before cares came, and the triumphs of a public career had intervened. I went away from that place feeling that I had seen a good man and a good woman and the heads of a happy household.

Almost the last time that he spoke to me, in this House, was when we were discussing something of a public nature that had occurred, where the service of the Episcopal Church had been recited in part, and he said to me—and afterwards it seemed like a prophecy; we do not know why these things come into the minds of men—he said to me: "I have for twenty years omitted from my prayers that part which says, 'Deliver us from sudden death.' When my Master wants me I hope he will take me quickly." I had a little talk with him as to why. He told me he thought that it was well, when a man's work was done, that he should be called without the intervening troubles that hang about the sick bed. And yet the incident had almost passed from my mind, until we received the sudden and shocking intelligence of the fact that in the presence of the friends of his wife and himself he had instantly fallen to rest.

What he has done, Mr. Speaker, belongs to the world. I have seen a star shoot from the firmament, "pass away to darkle in the trackless void," and yet philosophy teaches, and it is true, that the radiance enkindled by that meteor is added to the stores of beauty and luminousness of the world, and never will pass away. The influence of a life that is spent in the service of the country, in the cause of good politics, or in the practice of true law, can no more die out of existence than the enkindled radiance can pass the confines of the universe.

Some one sent me the other day a little bit of poetry, one of those gems called "Pearls of the Faith," which Edwin Arnold, in studying the literature of the Oriental nations, has written into the enduring form of our poetry and given to the world. It has the formulation of some of the best thoughts of that great and dusky race whose myriad millions pass as grains of sands with scarce a permanent figure in all the years, and yet which grains of sand are making up the continents of humanity upon which beat the long, rolling, ceaseless waves of time; and it seems to me in the study of the quiet, loving life of George W. Houk, and in his quick departure to other spheres, you find this consolation, the consolation of the far-away seer, and of all the loving and hoping world:

One morning in Medinah walked our Lord
Among the tombs: glad was the dawn, and broad
On headstones and on footstones sunshine lay;
Earth seemed so fair 'twas hard to be away.
"O people of the grave!" Mohammed said,
"Peace be with you!" Your caravan of dead
Hath passed the defile, and we living ones
Forget what man ye were, of whom the sons,
And what your merchandise and where ye went;
But Allah knows these things! Be ye content
Since Allah is "aware." Ah! God forgive
Those that are dead and us who briefly live.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, George W. Houk was my friend, and while no words of mine can add peace to his ashes or sweetness to his sleep, I beg to place on record my tribute of affection and esteem. He was one of the first members of the Fifty-second Congress whom I met after my own election, and the acquaintance which we formed while crossing Lake Superior together in the summer of 1891 ripened into an attachment which I enjoyed during his life, and which I cherish in memory now.

He was a well-rounded man—one of the most complete men I ever knew. Some are specialists and excel in a particular line of work, or become famous because of some faculty abnormally developed. Not so with Mr. Houk. He was not a one-sided man, nor a man with but one idea or one virtue. He so blended graces and good qualities, so combined the traits and characteristics which distinguish men as to be worthy of Antony's compliment to Brutus:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

He found his inspiration at his fireside, and approached the ideal in his domestic life. He and his faithful wife, who was both his helpmeet and companion, inhabited as tenants in common that sacred spot called home, and needed no court to define their relative rights and duties. The invisible walls which shut in that home and shut out all else had their foundations upon the earth and their battlements in the skies. No force could break them down, no poisoned arrows could cross their top, and at the gates thereof love and confidence stood ever upon guard.

In such a home the devoted parents reared a loving and dutiful family, and lived to see each son and daughter settled in life. And fortune had so smiled upon the children that the father was as far removed from anxious care concerning them as his beautiful estate, Runnymede, overlooking the Miami Valley, was removed from the noise and turmoil of the busy city with whose history his achievements were entwined. He did not leave to his children that doubtful blessing, a large fortune, but he left that priceless heritage which money can not buy—a name without a stain, a reputation without a blemish.

He was a man of surpassing geniality, and his cheerful face shed its radiance on all around him. It was my good fortune to sit by him during both terms of Congress, and I learned to look for the friendly salutation with which he greeted me every morning. He was a boon companion, and allowed no humor to escape him. He abounded in wise proverbs, in stories and in fables, and in all the affairs of life mingled with an artist's skill the lively colors with the grave.

He was, perhaps, not a great lawyer, in the sense of winning national reputation at the bar, and yet he had a legal mind and the habits of a practitioner. He clearly comprehended the principles involved in a case, weighed evidence, and balanced with more than ordinary skill the arguments on either side. He knew not only the law but the reason thereof, and if he did not outstrip his competitors in forensic contests he possessed the sturdy virtues which won and retained the confidence of the community and a prominent place at the bar.

He was a scholar, and a writer of rare ability; in fact many, charmed with his graceful sentences and ornate style, have believed that this was his special gift. He was an omnivorous reader, and possessed the bee's instinct of finding the honey in the flower. One is amazed at the amount of writing and public speaking which he did, and at the facility with which he grasped every subject and analyzed every question. His mind, like the refiner's fire, separated the pure metal from the dross. It is not strange that such a man should be in frequent demand, for his active interest in all public questions, the high esteem in which he was held, his methods of thought and felicity of expression, all combined to fit him for a prominent place in his community.

With him citizenship was a sacred trust as well as a privilege, and in the discharge of its responsibilities he exercised the most conscientious care. He was a politician in the sense that he was a student of the science of government, and a successful legislator in that he wrought into effective law the principles in which he believed. He possessed all the characteristics of the statesman. He reasoned out each proposition that came before him with a singleness of purpose and a desire to know the right.

He was industrious. Not only did he study all public questions, but he responded to every call made by individual constituents, and did it gladly, for he was himself one of the common people, and his sympathy went out to all who were in need. Ever in his place, ever ready for work, he gave to the public service the full measure of his devotion.

He was honest, both with himself and with others. Not only was he incorruptible so far as pecuniary influences go, but he was true to his own convictions. His fidelity to others was insured by strict adherence to the injunction—

> To thine ownself be true;
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

He was a brave man, and dared to follow his own judgment, even when it led him into disagreement with his party associates. His moral courage was developed to a high degree, and he was willing to assume responsibility for his every act, conscious of the rectitude of his purpose. His ability was recognized by his associates in Congress, and his opinions, based upon extensive research and wide experience, illuminated and ornamented by quotations from history, fiction, and poetry, were sought after more and more as men knew him better.

His life was one long journey upward, without a halt or backward step. His success was not meteoric; he won his way step by step, and pitched his tent on higher ground at the end of each day's travel. For more than sixty-five years his home was at Dayton, Ohio. There he attended school, taught school, read law, and practiced at the bar. There he spent the days of his boyhood and manhood, and there, after he had almost completed his three-score years and ten, he rests from his labors. The sorrowing multitudes who attended his funeral testified, as no language can, to the character of the man. Their expressions of tenderness and affection, and their gentle ministrations fitly crowned the career which they had watched with pride and love. Truly, "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

I shall not believe that even now his light is extinguished. If the Father deigns to touch with divine power the cold and pulseless heart of the buried acorn, and make it to burst forth from its prison walls, will He leave neglected in the earth the soul of man, who was made in the image of his Creator? If He stoops to give to the rosebush, whose withered blossoms float upon the breeze, the sweet assurance of another springtime, will He withhold the words of hope from the sons of men when the frosts of winter come? If Matter, mute and inanimate, though changed by the forces of Nature into a multitude of forms, can never die, will the imperial spirit of man suffer annihilation after it has paid a brief visit, like a royal guest, to this tenement of clay?

Rather let us believe that He who, in His apparent prodigality, wastes not the raindrop, the blade of grass, or the evening's sighing zephyr, but makes them all to carry out His eternal plans, has given immortality to the mortal, and gathered to Himself the generous spirit of our friend.

Instead of mourning, let us look up and address him in the words of the poet:

> Thy day has come, not gone;
> Thy sun has risen, not set;
> Thy life is now beyond
> The reach of death or change,
> Not ended—but begun.
> O, noble soul! O, gentle heart! Hail, and farewell.

Mr. STORER. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Mr. Houk the State that you and I so much honor and so much love has lost as its representative here one of those men in whose hands its prosperity was sure and its reputation always safe. It has lost a good lawyer, a man who had a reputation equal to that of the ablest on the bench; it has lost a wise, conservative, and courageous representative; and it has lost an honest, Christian gentleman as its citizen. Judge Houk was one of the few of my colleagues, when I came here in the Fifty-second Congress, that I had known before.

When I was but a boy at the bar in Hamilton County, he and his firm were towers of strength at the bar of that part of the State, which, without conceit, we consider to be the garden spot both for soil and in intellect and jurisprudence in the State of Ohio. The firm of Houk & McMahon, twice honored by seats in this House of Representatives, was the leading practicing firm in the whole Miami Valley. It was confined in its practice not to one county or to one Congressional district. I have seen them both, even looked at them with wonder and delight, practicing before my own home courts; and it was with the feeling that I was at home in Congress and in the committee where I was assigned when I found Judge Houk was there too.

I sat with him in committee, knowing him as fellow committeemen in Congress do know their associates; and I say, in my judgment he was as wise, as judicious, as conservative, as courteous, and as courageous a man as ever sat in that committee, whose history is second to none in this House. The estimation in which he was held in that committee I think everyone I see will unite in. I trust I remember aright, in saying that he and I never differed on any question of any moment that ever came up there, and many times have we conferred, being two men from the same State, on matters outside of the committee room. The estimation in which he is held by his comrades on that committee may best be shown, Mr. Chairman, by the resolutions which were unanimously adopted by that committee, copied upon its minutes, and which I am requested to offer to this House to have read at the desk, so that they may be made a part of my remarks and become a part of the permanent record of this day's proceedings.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your committee appointed to prepare a suitable memorial in honor of the memory of the late George W. Houk, of Ohio, late a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, respectfully report the following:

We, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress, have heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of our associate, Hon. George W. Houk of Ohio.

Pursuant to action of this committee heretofore taken, it is hereby

Resolved, That this memorial be entered on the minutes as a mark of enduring respect to the memory of a courteous associate, whose character, abilities, and devotion to his duties on the committee have earned for him the respect of his associates, while his kindness of manner and of heart have inspired them with personal regard and affection, and as a tribute to a distinguished and laborious Representative, an upright and God-fearing gentleman whose death has been a lasting loss to his fellow-members in this committee and the House, to his constituents whom he served justly and faithfully, and to his country.

And further resolved, That this memorial and resolutions be reported from this committee by its chairman, to the House on the day set apart by special order for eulogies on Hon. George W. Houk, in order that they may form a part of the permanent record o fthe proceedings on that occasion.

Mr. STORER. Mr. Speaker, the career of Judge Houk is not one that has struck this House with its wonderful eloquence and its control of the floor and with its command in the business of the House. But none of us who remember the few occasions upon which he addressed this House or the Committee of the Whole, I hope none of us at least but remember the dignity of his thought, the precision and elegance of his language, and the courage of his opinions. We all know at times he differed from the majority of his own party. I also know that no man believed more thoroughly in the principles of his party or was more convinced they were the ones that should control this Government than he.

Though I have felt that I could not agree with him, feeling that the principles of the party to which I belong are those which should fitly govern this country, nevertheless I can not let this occasion pass without bearing my testimony to the honesty and courage with which he always supported the convictions of his heart, the principles of his party, and the course of that party whenever he thought it coincident with those principles.

His district lay close to mine. We were neighbors in the real sense of the term. That district, sir, as you know as well as I, is one that has marked characteristics. It is one of the individual districts of our State. It has been represented here with almost unequaled strength during the last twenty-five or thirty years. It has had as its representative Gen. Schenck; it has had Judge Houk's own law partner, the peer of any man at the Ohio bar, John McMahon; it has had James E. Campbell; and it has had Judge Houk. And I say that in conservative thought, in integrity of purpose, in solidity of character, in fidelity to convictions of truth, that district has never been better or more strongly represented on this floor than it was in the person of him whose death we are now deploring.

Mr. McKAIG. Mr. Speaker, to the members of the House the intelligence of the death of the late distinguished gentleman from Ohio came like a flash of lightning out of a clear sky, as it occurred but a few hours after he left his seat apparently in good health and spirits. I met him at the east door as he was leaving the House, and received a kindly nod and a pleasant smile in response to my salutation, and in a very brief period of time the news of his sudden demise came as a striking commentary upon the unstableness of human life.

An eloquent Senator, who died with equal suddenness, in a memorial address upon a deceased colleague, said:

When those of us who have been here for a series of years bring to our minds the many occasions when we have been called upon to pay the last tribute of esteem and affection to brethren who have fallen by the wayside, we may well pause and consider whether the ends which we pursue here or in other fields of activity are worth the toil, energy, and anxiety which we contribute to them, especially when even the largest successes bring transient satisfaction, and the joy of triumph and eagerness of struggling controversy are alike ended with sudden extinguishment.

Although I feel that I can not add to the wealth of eulogy paid to our deceased associate, yet my long acquaintance with and warm friendship for him urges me to pay a brief tribute to his memory.

I first met him during the winter of 1865, when visiting my relations in Dayton, Ohio, where he was a member of the law firm of Houk & McMahon, and even then a prominent figure in the legal and political circles of the county and State. My association with him at that time enabled me to discern and appreciate not only his genial social qualities and generous, affectionate nature, but also the strong mental powers that enabled him to occupy a commanding position in his Congressional district, which could boast of such men as Vallandigham, Gunckle, Schenck, McMahon, and Campbell.

The salient features of his personality were his clear sense of right, his hatred of all shams, his simplicity and candor, fidelity to every obligation, and his strong common sense. A marked characteristic was his kind thoughtfulness to the younger men of the legal profession and a ready appreciation of the many difficulties they had to overcome in struggling up the ladder of life, and they could always rely upon his ready and efficient aid when difficulty overtook them.

Combined with marked legal ability were scholarly interests and attainments that led him to indulge as a pastime in the broad fields of literature and journalism.

Mr. Houk was born in Cumberland County, Pa., September 25, 1825, but his father moved to Dayton, Ohio, in 1827, so his life from early youth was closely identified with the social, commercial, and political interests of his adopted city and State. From the time he taught school, studied law, and formed a partnership with his preceptor, Hon. Peter P. Lowe, in 1846, until he entered the Fifty-second Congress, his life was full of activity. In 1852-'53 he was elected to the State Legislature from Montgomery County, and as a testimonial to his legal ability he was selected as chairman of the judiciary committee, although a young member serving his first term.

His party, in recognition of his unswerving Democracy, sent him as a delegate to the celebrated Charleston-Baltimore Democratic national convention, where he was an ardent supporter of Mr. Douglas for the Presidency. He was unanimously nominated for the circuit judgeship for the second district, but was defeated. His love for the beautiful city in which he spent his life and won legal and political honors was strong and abiding, and he always had its welfare at heart. Prominent in the councils of his party, he never neglected an opportunity to advance the material interests of his State and county through legislative avenues, and was never such a partisan that he was willing to aid or abet political action that might result in party advantage and yet work a detriment to the State.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I could not better discharge my duty to our dead colleague in this behalf than to incorporate in my remarks the eloquent and beautiful memorial address of the members of the bar of Montgomery County, of which he was an honored member:

IN MEMORIAM.

The members of the bar of Montgomery County, assembled to do honor to the memory of their deceased brother, Hon. Geo. W. Houk, with melancholy pleasure place upon record this brief summary of his life with their sincere testimony to his talents as a lawyer, his integrity in public life, his exalted character as a citizen, and his genial qualities as a man and companion.

It is unfortunate that on this occasion we shall sadly miss the ready and glowing pen that has recorded, on so many similar occasions for so many others, the story of their lives and the sympathy of their fellow-members of the bar. But our accomplished friend is dead, and to inferior hands the sad but pleasing task must be committed.

It is pleasant to be able to say with truth that from his early youth to his latest manhood Mr. Houk was in every way a model for young men. He was always moral, upright, temperate, and honorable in his conduct, so much so that in a long and active life slander never temporarily perched upon his name, nor did partisan rancor ever breathe a suspicion upon his honesty or his motives, or the purity of his life.

Blessed by nature with a commanding form and a most striking presence, he looked, as he was in fact, one of nature's noblemen. In this outward garb of manly beauty there was inclosed a strong intellect, a genial heart, and an unbounded love of beauty, culture, and knowledge that would have made him one of the foremost men of our country had his ambition been as restless and as eager as his capacity was great. But ambition seemed to have few charms. He loved above all other things his lovely and hospitable home upon the hilltop, and the wife and children and grandchildren by whom he was there surrounded, and to whom he was a most devoted, indulgent, and affectionate husband and father, and the numerous friends in whose society he always delighted; and his rugged physical and intellectual vigor never sought that field for display in his earlier days that would have given him his proper stand among his fellow-men.

No doubt his life was happier. But much may have been lost to his country. There were few men better read in the history of the world, better versed in the Constitution of our nation, or fuller of the knowledge of its political events, or more studious of their philosophical bearing. And still fewer men possessed the rare gift of expression upon paper that would have advanced him at once to the front rank of literary eminence had he chosen that field. He did not love his profession as some men do, although for many years he was a steady worker in it, and he had a wide, varied, successful, and honorable practice. He was not fond of the narrow rules and apparent technicalities of a jurisprudence largely built upon established and sometimes contradictory precedents and sometimes at variance with our instincts of natural justice. He often felt fettered in his search for what was right and just by the arbitrary decision of a system instead of the resolution of what was just in the case before him. And the most loyal among us can not but admit that we sometimes share in his feeling.

The law was only a secondary mistress with our friend. It is true she kept his house. But literature adorned, embellished, and inhabited it as his prime favorite. He loved philosophy, history, literature, and poetry with a fervent love, as his well-selected and well-thumbed library plainly shows, and his wonderful talent and passion for developing his own ideas with a pen that was remarkable for its attractive and gorgeous style found but little vent in the preparation of petitions, answers, or stately and formal briefs. Yet he possessed the qualities that would have made him a great lawyer, if that had been the inclination of his mind. He was logical, he was just, and he was of even temperament and possessed of a well-balanced mind. His judgment was always good. He knew by intuition what was right. But with all these qualifications, we all know that if the pursuit of the law is only a duty and not a pleasure, the brightest intellect will fail to reach the highest culture.

Mr. Houk's great delight was in his home. Few men in active life have spent so many years in the bosom of their family. He loved to spend his hours in his library, surrounded by his loving and gifted wife and children, and in the midst of those dumb yet speaking companions of all ages and nations who rested upon the shelves of his bookcase, inviting him to constant communion with their lofty souls, and never tiring of his congenial society, he would look down upon our smoky and restless city, and its tireless schemes of vanity and ambition, with the dignity and almost the contempt of a philosopher.

Such a life, with such surroundings, could not but leave a stamp upon his character. It emphasized the qualities that he already possessed. It made him contemplative and strengthened the balance of his mind. It gave him time for self-inspection and room for thought before action. In his partial retirement he cultivated all the good qualities with which he entered upon life. He was incapable of a mean, dishonest, or doubtful action, and he especially despised such conduct in all others. He became independent in thought and action—so much so as to dissent, in a marked manner, upon several notable occasions from the majority of his political friends. He was always outspoken, and when meanness or trickery or dishonesty crossed his path, whether at the bar, or in politics, or in private life, his tongue was ready to expose or denounce it.

But it is as a brother at the bar and a daily companion and friend that we who knew him the best love most to remember him. He did not seek popularity with the methods of the handshaker, or "mixer," as he is styled by his admirers, and to those who think this insincere outgrowth of modern politics the ideal of a warm-hearted man he might seem cold or haughty. But with those who were congenial, or with whom he was thrown by business or pleasure, he was a most genial and entertaining companion. His fund of anecdote, whether of the higher character of biography or the ordinary, now so popular, was unlimited and ever ready, and he was scarcely equaled in the narration of what was witty and humorous. His own pleasure was as great as that of the listener; and while many of us may best recall him in the different scenes of life, all of us can see him now with his hale, hearty manner, and his joyous life, full of life and life's enjoyment, as if care had never laid her heavy hand upon his head, and existence was in itself the sum of happiness.

When the time and opportunity came for him to be promoted to the halls of the National Council—too tardily, it is true—it is no wonder that his friends, without regard to politics, rejoiced that in his declining years he should be honored in a manner so pleasing to himself and so satisfactory to his friends and constituents. He appreciated and enjoyed the honor most heartily.

The most striking feature in his service in Washington was his devotion to the interests of the pensioners at the Home at a time when his care for them could not but be disinterested. There grew up among the inmates of that institution an affection for him that was touching, and it is a lasting monument to perpetuate, as an element of his character, that his sympathy was with the poor and the needy, or the unfortunate, and that his regard for the brave defenders of the nation was not actuated by interest, but by the goodness of his heart.

Mr. Speaker, the leisure hours of his life being devoted to general study, his mind necessarily became broadened and in touch with the great world that lies outside of the limits of a professional life. This, together with travel, fostered the social side of his nature.

He built a commodious residence on a splendid elevation overlooking the beautiful city of Dayton and commanding a striking view of a part of the rich and famous Miami Valley, where, surrounded by his children and grandchildren, he could cultivate his domestic and social tastes. Here he delighted to retire and indulge in his favorite occupation—writing and studying; however, never unmindful of his hosts of friends who always found the latchstring of his door ready for their touch and to whom he ever gave a warm and appreciative welcome.

Although beyond the prime of life when he entered the Fifty-second Congress, in December, 1891, he took up the duties belonging to the high position and discharged them with fidelity and efficiency. He was constant in his attendance upon the sessions of the House, and was uniformly present at committee meetings, and never in any way permitted personal action to delay the public business. He took an active part in the debates upon the leading questions before the House, and at all times seemed to feel a strong interest in the routine business of the session when the pending work frequently failed through lack of a quorum.

A grateful constituency, in full appreciation of his diligent, painstaking, and efficient work in the Fifty-second Congress, gave substantial recognition of the same by reflecting him to the Fifty-third Congress by a largely increased majority.

Stricken at his post of duty by an enemy which never yet was conquered, our late associate surrendered in obedience to the dictates of an inscrutable Providence, and his spirit passed across the silent river.

Mr. Speaker, when his mortal remains were conveyed to his native city for interment, a great concourse of citizens met the train at the station and escorted the remains to the church, which was beautifully draped in mourning, and where the solemn services were witnessed by hundreds of mourners. Great crowds of people thronged the streets as the funeral cortege moved from the church to the cemetery, striving in every way to show the high esteem in which they held their late honored Representative. He was buried at a point in the cemetery not far distant from his beloved home and overlooking the city he loved so much, and the last solemn burial rites were performed 'mid thousands of sorrowing friends.

As an eminent Senator said of a deceased associate:

He has departed. His term has not expired, but his name has been stricken from the rolls of the House; his credentials remain in its archives, but an honored successor sits unchallenged in his place. He has no vote nor voice, but the consideration of great measures affecting the interest of every citizen of the Republic is interrupted with the concurrence and approval of all, that the representatives of forty-four Commonwealths may rehearse the virtues and commemorate the career of an associate who is beyond the reach of praise or censure—in the kingdom of the dead.

Can we not rest in the belief that after a life well spent, with its duties faithfully performed, the soul of our deceased associate has at last found eternal rest, amid the scenes of its creation, in the presence of its God, for hath He not said, "He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die."

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, "In the midst of life we are in death." Never was the truth of these solemn and oft-repeated words more sadly exemplified and impressed upon my mind than when on the morning of February 9 last the startling information was communicated to me that my beloved colleague and old friend, the Hon. George W. Houk, late a member of this House from the Third Ohio Congressional district, had been suddenly stricken down by that grim destroyer death, from whose embrace there is no escape. For it was but about three hours, something less perhaps, before this most sudden and unexpected blow that took him from among us forever that I saw him pass out of this Hall smiling and nodding pleasantly to me as he passed by as was his wont whenever and wherever he chanced to meet me. He appeared to be in his usual good health and spirits, and hence little did I dream that in less than three short hours this world should know him no more forever.

I had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Houk, not intimately but fairly well, for several years. He was indeed a man among men. Always dignified, yet always affable and pleasant. He was a true and sincere Democrat in politics from principle.

But it was not so much my purpose to-day, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the time of the House in endeavoring to pay a feeble personal tribute to the memory of our departed friend as it was to place upon record and call your attention to just how he was regarded at home by those who had known him long and well during his whole life, as neighbor, lawyer, and statesman, knowing full well that their opinions, spontaneously expressed, will much more fully impress your minds than anything I could or might say.

And to this end I will first call your attention to an article published in one of the leading newspapers (of opposite politics) of his beloved city of Dayton, under date of February 10, last, being the next morning after the news of his untimely death had reached the city:

THE STARTLING NEWS.

Last evening the citizens were startled and shocked at the report that the Hon. George W. Houk, representing the Third district in Congress, had died suddenly in Washington while on his way from the Capitol to his home on Connecticut avenue. At first the news was received with doubt, but about half-past 7 the Journal confirmed the news by communicating with Washington. The rumor, which sadly turned out to be too true, had spread through the city, and a number of the deceased's friends congregated at the Journal office to have the report confirmed and to learn the details of the sad death.

In the hotels and at the Dayton Club groups of gentlemen stood about discussing the news and recalling the splendid qualities of the deceased Congressman.

The large family connection were informed later in the evening directly, the wife telegraphing the sad news of her sudden bereavement. His loss will cast a gloom over these that will not easily be expelled.

The portly, erect figure, genial face, and graceful, gallant manner of Mr. Houk were familiar to every Daytonian, and there were none but who enjoyed his presence and associations. At the time of his decease he was serving his second term in Congress, sent from the Third district. He has lived in this city, or just without its limits, since 1827.

His delightful home, Runnymede, has long been the synonym for hospitality, and for all that is beautiful and delightful.

Here he used to hasten as soon as he could close his law office on Third street, where he found the secluded, restful place where he spent the happiest hours of his life, retrospecting, reading, and digesting the various thoughts that occupied his mind continually.

His home commanded the most superb view of the city, and on an immense veranda he was accustomed to sit or lie in his hammock watching the sun sink down into the Miami in the western distance, the smoke of the busy furnaces partially clouding the city give way to the gloaming. The lights begin to sparkle and the stars to shine—a restful, happy period in which any troubles of the day which had annoyed him gave way to his innate love for mankind. In those hours his natural nature carefully weighed both sides of all questions, and the next day he could return to the busy scenes of city life with that genial urbanity and universal courtesy which were so characteristic of him.

He loved to read, to study history, and follow pastoral pursuits. Nothing delighted him so much as a tramp over the farm, watching the development of his crops and the increasing of his herds. Amid such pleasant home scenes as these he reared the splendid family which he now leaves to sorrow.

In politics the deceased was allied heart and soul with the principles of the Democratic party, though he put aside his love of party if he saw his duty clear to oppose its movements. This he demonstrated in a signal manner when he repudiated the late Hon. Samuel J. Tilden.

The Hon. George W. Houk was born in 1826, in Cumberland County, Pa., of which his father, Adam Houk was a native, and his grandfather, Adam Houk, sr., became a resident about the middle of the last century.

In 1827 Mr. Adam Houk moved to Dayton with his family and George was educated in the schools here, finishing his school education at the Dayton Academy under the instruction of the late E. E. Barney. He selected the profession of law, of which he became such a distinguished member.

He studied in the office of Peter P. Lowe, esq., and when admitted to the bar in 1847 went into partnership with his instructor. A year or so after he dissolved this partnership he entered into partnership with the Hon. George B. Holt. Later, in 1860, he formed a partnership with the Hon. John A. McMahon, which lasted twenty years, ceasing in 1880, since which time he has conducted his practice by himself.

In 1852 Mr. Houk was sent to the Legislature, though only 27 years old. He was distinguished by being made chairman of the judiciary committee, through which passed all the important legislation necessary to confirm the laws of the State in the new constitution.

He was sent in 1860 to the Democratic convention, which was held at Charleston, at which Stephen A. Douglas was nominated. In 1876 he was sent to the St. Louis convention, at which Samuel J. Tilden was nominated, and whose nomination he could not sustain.

On December 25, 1856, Mr. Houk married Eliza P. Thurston, the daughter of Robert A. Thurston, and granddaughter of Horatio G. Phillips. She is also the sister of Gen. Gates P. Thurston, of Nashville, Tenn. The lives of these two people have been particularly beautiful, and the deep sympathy of every one goes out spontaneously to the stricken wife from whom he has so suddenly been called.

He leaves three children—Mrs. Harry E. Mead, Mrs. Harry Talbot, and Mr. Thurston Houk—and nine grandchildren. Mr. David Houk, of South Ludlow street, is his brother. Mrs. Mary Ramsey was his sister. Mrs. John G. Lowe, of South Maine street, the widow of the late John G. Lowe, is the mother of his wife.

LITERARY PURSUITS.

In literary attainments the deceased was a writer of fine, forcible, elegant English, and in this had few superiors. Through much and careful reading he had stored in his mind a fund of information upon which he could call at all times to the benefit of his hearers and readers. He contributed much to the press, and his articles were read with more than general interest. He was for a time the editor of the Morning Times of this city, but his genial nature rather rebelled against the rough contact that this duty often compelled to come with the world. The hours, also, which the editor of a morning newspaper must spend at his office were those which Mr. Houk most loved at his Runnymede; so he gave up this pursuit. However, since his busy life in politics, he has often contributed articles on the questions of the day that clearly expressed his convictions and those of his party. He contributed to the magazines occasionally, and wrote the history of the Dayton bar.

He was a forcible speaker and eloquent. He preferred at all times to talk on topics of vital interest to his hearers, and avoided speechmaking for the sake of making a speech.

At all times he was a graceful, agreeable gentleman, genial and gallant. In the history of the city of Dayton the following paragraph says:

"The Hon. George W. Houk has attained distinction through his literary labors and acquirements as well as in his profession of the law. His literary labors, however, have been performed mainly for the sake of diversion and of pleasure derived therefrom rather than for the sake of gain or fame, and what he has achieved in this kind of labor has not been done at the expense of the legal profession."

POLITICAL HONORS.

Within the last few years Mr. Houk conceived the ambition for political honors, and expressed the desire to be sent to Congress from this district. The first nomination resulted in defeat, Mr. E. L. Morey, of Hamilton, being sent in his stead by the Republican party.

Two years later at Franklin Mr. Houk was renominated in a most enthusiastic manner, a great many of his personal friends who had never taken any interest in politics going in a body to that convention to give personal testimony to their confidence in and respect for the candidate. It was a spirited convention, but Mr. Houk was handsomely nominated, and at the election which followed received a big majority. Two years subsequent Mr. Houk was again a candidate and was nominated without opposition, the Hon. John A. McMahon presenting his name in the strongest terms at Hamilton.

At the election in the fall of 1892 he went through with a sweeping majority, and was one of the members of Congress whose complexion is so overwhelmingly in accord with his own convictions.

The many questions of so great interest to the country, which have come up during his connection with Congress, were all carefully investigated by him, and he was thoroughly informed on every side of each.

Those opposed to him politically may have objected strongly to his vote on different questions, but none have ever thought that he ever voted for any but at the dictate of his conscience and the absolute belief that his convictions were based on that which was right and proper.

And of a more impressive character still I will next invite your attention to an eloquent and just tribute to his worth and character, written and published on the same day in the same journal by his old friend and neighbor, Maj. W. D. Bickham, who, by the way, was himself suddenly stricken down by the cold hand of death within a few days thereafter, much in the same manner as his friend, Mr. Houk, prefacing it by stating, as indicated in the article, that Mr. Bickham was of opposite politics.

DEATH OF HON. GEORGE W. HOUK.

The startling intelligence came to this office yesterday afternoon of the sudden death at Washington of Hon. George W. Houk, Representative in Congress from this Congressional district.

It is needless to say that the woeful news caused widespread and sincere sorrow among all the acquaintances of Mr. Houk, of whatever age, sect, or political party they might be.

Mr. Houk was a man among men, a gentleman of the old school, of splendid character, fine personal presence, dignified bearing, noble sentiments, and warm affections. He was the very soul of honor; and during his long professional and political life in this city and vicinity, and as our Representative in the Legislature and in Congress he was never charged with or even suspected of any unmanly or dishonorable conduct. He thoroughly hated and despised falsehood and pretense, and regardless of political or personal consequences never hesitated to so declare himself upon all occasions that seemed to demand it.

This paper has had occasion many times to criticise Mr. Houk's political expressions and votes, but never his personal conduct. Indeed, during all the years of our political differences, which sometimes were very warmly discussed in public, Mr. Houk and the editor of the Journal have been upon the best personal relations.

He was a man to tie to under all circumstances; solicitous of the public welfare as he understood its needs, ready with his pen and voice, both of which were able and far above the average, for every good word and work a public-spirited citizen in the fullest and best sense of that term.

His mind, like his face and forehead, was broad and high, rather than sharp and cunning.

Though an able lawyer and a pleasing and eloquent public speaker, his forte was probably with his pen. He wrote with great readiness and ease and had a natural instinct for euphony and harmony in his use of words.

There was always a lofty character about his language that commanded attention and admiration, and he had a way of rounding out his sentences with a majestic sweep, like the essays of Macaulay.

If he had devoted his life to literature instead of the law, Mr. Houk would have undoubtedly been upon the lists of prominent American writers.

No man in Dayton was more versatile and adaptable. He could make a speech, try a case, write an essay, relate an anecdote, or enter into the lighter pleasures of a social circle with zeal and success.

By the bar he was universally respected. On all memorial occasions he was an active and sincere participant, and by common consent was selected as the proper person to draft resolutions and make an address. In such duties he seemed to take a melancholy pleasure, and his zeal and interest were not measured by the social or professional prominence of the subject of his pen.

In fact his legal brethren declare that the most carefully prepared and beautiful tribute that he ever wrote was upon the occasion of the death of one of the humblest members of the bar; a man of indifferent success in life, so far as the world views success, but greatly beloved among his fellows for his modesty and sincerity of life.

To some Mr. Houk appeared haughty and unapproachable. But no man was more affable or genuinely democratic in his feelings.

He was always ready to listen to the story of a pensioner, or to lend a helping hand to any worthy man of his acquaintance. He was a man of large heart, cultivated mind, generous spirit, and noble impulses, and he will long be missed and sincerely mourned in this community.

Mr. Speaker, from the time Mr. Houk arrived at years of manhood until he entered Congress he was an able, active, honorable lawyer, enjoying a large and lucrative practice, and held the respect and confidence of all the members of the bar with whom he was thrown in contact. But let them speak for themselves. I now read to you the proceedings of the Montgomery County Bar Association, of which he was an old and honored member, at a meeting held on the morning of February 17 last:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE MONTGOMERY COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION IN RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF HON. GEORGE W. HOUK.

A largely attended meeting of the Montgomery County Bar Association was held in Judge Elliot's room yesterday morning, at which final action was taken relative to the death of Hon. George W. Houk. Judge Elliott presided and Charles W. Dustin, esq., acted as secretary.

The committee appointed to draft memorial resolutions submitted its report, pending adoption of which touching and eloquent remarks eulogistic of the life and character of the deceased were made by a number of the members. These were Hon. L. B. Gunckel, Cyrus H. Baldwin, Elihu Thompson, O. M. Gottschall, John M. Sprigg, Hon. Wickliffe Belville, George R. Young, E. P. Matthews, Hon. John A. McMahon, Judge Dennis Dwyer, and Henderson Elliott. Following is the memorial:

The members of the bar of Montgomery County, assembled to do honor to the memory of their deceased brother, Hon. George W. Houk, with melancholy pleasure place upon record this brief summary of his life, with their sincere testimony to his talents as a lawyer, his integrity in public life, his exalted character as a citizen, and his genial qualities as a man and companion.

It is unfortunate that on this occasion we shall sadly miss the ready and glowing pen that has recorded on so many similar occasions for so many others the story of their lives and the sympathy of their fellow-members of the bar. But our accomplished friend is dead, and to inferior hands the sad but pleasing task must be committed.

Mr. Houk was born in Cumberland County, Pa., on the 25th of September, 1835. His family removed to Dayton in 1827, where his home has always been. He was educated at the academy at Dayton, taught school, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of this county when he was but 21 years of age. He then entered into partnership with Hon. Peter P. Lowe in the practice of law. After a few years of successful practice he was elected to the Legislature in 1851, and though a very young man, was made chairman of the judiciary committee of the house. In 1860 he was a delegate to the Charleston-Baltimore convention, adhering most loyally to the cause of Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, and in 1876 he was a delegate to the national Democratic convention held in St. Louis. In 1884 he was chosen district elector, and in 1890 he was elected to Congress, and reëlected in 1892.

He was a candidate upon many other occasions for high honors, when he failed of success only because his party was in a hopeless minority.

During all the time preceding his election to Congress he was actively engaged in the practice of the profession, and for nineteen years was a member of the firm of Houk & McMahon.

It is pleasant to be able to say with truth that from his early youth to his latest manhood, Mr. Houk was in every way a model for young men. He was always moral, upright, temperate, and honorable in his conduct—so much so that, in a long and active life, slander never temporarily perched upon his name, nor did partisan rancor ever breathe a suspicion upon his honesty or his motives or the purity of his life.

But with those who were congenial, or with whom he was thrown by business or pleasure, he was a most genial and entertaining companion. His fund of anecdote, whether of the higher character of biography or the ordinary, now so popular, was unlimited and ever ready, and he was scarcely equaled in the narration of what was witty and humorous. His own pleasure was as great as that of the listener, and while many of us may best recall him in the different scenes of life, all of us can see him now with his hale, hearty manner and his joyous laugh, full of life and of his life's enjoyment, as if care had never laid her heavy hand upon his head, and existence was in itself the sum of happiness.

When the time and opportunity came for him to be promoted to the halls of the national councils—too tardily, it is true—it is no wonder that his friends, without regard to politics, rejoiced that in his declining years he should be honored in a manner so pleasing to himself and so satisfactory to his friends and constituents. He appreciated and enjoyed the honor heartily.

The most striking feature in his service in Washington was his devotion to the interest of the pensioners at the home at a time when his care for them could not but be disinterested. There grew up among the inmates of that institution an affection for him that was touching; and it is a lasting monument to perpetuate, as an element of his character, that his sympathy was with the poor and the needy or the unfortunate, and that his regard for the brave defenders of the nation was not actuated by interest, but by the goodness of his heart.

The committee submit the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in the death of Hon. George W. Houk the bar has lost an able, upright, and cultured member; the State a conscientious and faithful legislator; our people an honorable, high-toned, and valuable member of community; his associates a warm-hearted, genial friend, and his family a devoted, indulgent, and affectionate husband and father, to whom we tender our profoundest sympathy.

"Resolved, That the judges of the court be requested to place this memorial upon the minutes of the court, and that a copy be transmitted to his family."

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN A. McMAHON,
WARREN MUNGER,
E. THOMPSON,
THOMAS CORWIN,
JAMES H. BAGGOTT,
Committee.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted, when the meeting adjourned.

Mr. Houk was the ever-faithful and devoted friend of the Union soldier, and the news of his death was received at the Soldiers' Home (located near Dayton, in his district) with a genuine and widespread feeling of sorrow and regret. And here I will let the old soldiers speak for themselves also:

William Lowell Putnam Commandery, No. 24, Union Veterans' Union, of the Soldiers' Home, held a meeting in the Grand Army of the Republic Hall, and took action relative to the death of their friend, comrade, and benefactor, the Hon. George W. Houk. The following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That William Lowell Putnam Command, Union Veterans' Union, has heard with profound sorrow of the death of their honored comrade, George W. Houk, who was stricken down in the midst of a useful life, and as a mark of respect to his memory.

"Resolved, That it extends to his afflicted family its sincere sympathy in their bereavement, and that the adjutant of the command be instructed to transmit to the family of the deceased a certified copy of the foregoing resolution; and be it further

"Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect members of the command and all other veterans be requested to pay the last sad tribute to his memory by following the remains to their last earthly resting place.

"Resolved, That in the death of the honorable George W. Houk the veterans of the Soldiers' Home have lost their warmest friend, and one who has always advocated their cause wisely and persistently, and with a moderation that always carried with it a conviction of the justness of their claims."

As a further evidence of the high esteem in which he was held by those who knew him best I may mention the fact that the city council, which was in session at the time the news of his sudden death reached the city, immediately appointed a committee of their number to draft appropriate resolutions of regret, which were unanimously adopted, followed by the adjournment of the council out of respect to his memory.

But what more need be said, Mr. Speaker, in addition to all this of the life and character of our departed colleague? Surely nothing, save perhaps that we, his fellow-members, those of us at least who knew him best, do most sincerely unite with his neighbors and constituents in bearing like testimony to his goodness and worth.

We also bear witness with them to his generous qualities and genial character, which made him popular here as well as at home. For nearly three years he was a useful and distinguished member of this body, serving with painstaking care and promptitude as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of the Committee on Pensions. He was always found at his post, prompt, careful, and conscientious in the discharge of his official duties. With them, his friends, his neighbors and constituents, we bear witness that in his death this House and the country sustained the loss of a most valuable and useful member. And with them, we most sincerely mourn his loss, with the earnest hope and belief that our late colleague is now at rest in that better land. Amen.

Mr. RITCHIE. Mr. Speaker, in Ohio, where the greater portion of his life was spent, our late colleague, the Hon. George W. Houk, stood high in the esteem of his fellows. He possessed the reputation of being an honorable, amiable, and affable man. By this reputation I knew him well for years, but it was not until the closing day of the Fifty-second Congress, of which he was a worthy member, that I formed with him a personal acquaintance, which soon ripened into a friendly intimacy, that was as instructive as it was pleasant and as lasting as it was strong. At the commencement of the present Congress, new member as I was and wholly untutored as to the practice and rules of its procedure, the necessity oft arose to seek information from others who were older and more experienced than I.

In all the membership of this House, upon such matters, no one possessed a richer mine of knowledge, nor imparted it to others with more generous accuracy than did the gentleman to whose memory to-day we gladly, though sadly, pay our unworthy tribute of reverence and of love. In this body there are two classes of members. There are those, first, who deem it not only proper, but necessary, to address the House upon every subject that comes before Congress for its consideration, and, with them, the more trivial the matter under discussion the greater the necessity for talk.

There is still another class who prefer to listen to others rather than to talk themselves, and who, by silent devotion to duty and by indefatigable labor upon committees, shape and fashion pending legislation into law. To the first class belong the so-called "record-makers," but the other class embraces the real law-makers of the land. While the former too often talk without thinking, the latter generally think without talking. To this latter class belonged our late colleague from Ohio.

While the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may not shine resplendent with brilliant orations delivered by him, his constant attendance upon the House, his arduous labors upon committees, his fidelity to his people, and the correctness of his votes, as cast, speak more eloquently far in his behalf than any mere empty words he might have uttered possibly could.

Mr. Houk was an excellent lawyer, and before he became a member of this House practiced his chosen profession at Dayton, Ohio, with an ability and zeal that ranked him high at his local bar. He practiced law upon the plane of honor. He used none of the law's quiddits nor its tricks. He cared not for the withered branches of technicality but chopped rather at the very root of a legal proposition that in his judgment was unsound. If I were asked what traits of character most predominated in him it would be difficult to answer. He was generous and kind, yet steadfast and firm. While he had respect and toleration for the opinion of others, he still possessed those of his own. These he formed himself, by his own methods of reasoning, and having done so these opinions became convictions which he dared express with the fearlessness of a knight.

In all my intercourse with him, I never heard him speak of a fellow-member a single unkind word, for "his tongue was chained except in praise." Hypocrisy, insincerity, and sham were foreign to his nature. Simplicity of manners and naturalness of character possessed him, for he followed no pattern. He was himself alone. In his social life he was a prince. That he was popular here, is evidenced by the many tributes of respect that have been paid to his memory to-day. That he was popular at home was shown by the thousands of people who followed his dust to the silent tomb. Let his epitaph, in golden, glittering characters, proclaim of him that he was a loving husband, an indulgent father, a wise legislator, a faithful friend, a good lawyer, and an honest man.

Hail and farewell!

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it is said that some men are born great, that some have greatness thrust upon them, while others by their individual efforts carve out their own destiny.

The latter seems to have been true of Judge Houk.

I have been assigned the privilege of bringing my garland and placing it upon the tablet to his memory.

We entered upon our duties on the floor of this House at the same time, and as we took the oath of office we realized that we were entering upon new duties, duties which carried with them grave responsibilities.

Both born in the same State, of a hardy and earnest pioneer stock, while surrounded and reared under different influences from myself, I could see in his outgrowth and development the sturdy and the inflexible will of the early pioneer of Pennsylvania. With such a character the call of duty was one to be implicitly obeyed.

As our acquaintance began with the commencement of the Fifty-second Congress, I shall speak of him as I knew him in our committee room, and as he revealed his character to me as a member of this House.

I found on many questions that there was a great diversity of opinion between us; those differences I soon learned were differences of convictions; it became evident to my mind that he was a man of very strong character, possessing a philosophical mind, and seeking to establish every truth by a course of logical reasoning.

As in life through our social intercourse we learn to respect our friends, so in death let us cherish their memory and keep ever in mind their good deeds.

We are like the waves upon the seashore, we come and go, we are here to-day, we may be on the other shore to-morrow.

The present only is ours. How soon we may be called to realize the mystery of the life beyond, no one can tell.

Before the sun of life sets for us let us strive to do some deed that will make the world the wiser and the better for our having lived in it.

The mystery of life is not yet unfolded to any of us, but we are turning over leaf by leaf the book of life from day to day, and sooner or later the end will come, and we will be consigned to our narrow home; but ere the volume of life closes to us let us strive to live so that we may have a brighter awakening in the world beyond.

Like the giant oak, man has a small beginning, but unlike the oak he has a great mission to perform in the battle of life. His mission is as broad as humanity itself; it is to lift up, and not tear down. We sow that others may reap. If true, as has been said, that every thought and act reveals the character of an individual, it is ours to know the motives that actuate the man. His nobility of character is seen in his endeavor to elevate society, in broadening the sphere of human action, in teaching by precept and example our duties to the state and to humanity.

Mr. Speaker, in Judge Houk's death the nation has lost a loyal public servant, one who possessed rugged honesty of purpose, modest and unostentatious, broad-minded and yet never posing for display or effect. To me he seemed while quiet in demeanor straightforward in action. I regarded him as a man who would submit to no dictation, one who would acknowledge no master.

As I see him now in my mind, plowing his way up the rugged hill of science in his academic course we see him possessed of those higher ambitions which lead to great attainments in life.

Scarcely had he completed his academic course until we find him engaged in the profession of teaching; but his mind seemed to grasp far broader fields of thought. He turned his attention to law, entering upon that profession at the age of 21.

At the age of 27 he entered upon his duties as a legislator in the State of Ohio, and, although so young, we find he was made chairman of the judiciary committee of the house.

When we examine his history as an individual, whether as a schoolboy, a student at law, as a legislator, or as a member of this House, we see the same inflexible purpose.

His history shows that with age he grew in the confidence of his constituents.

He may not have been a polished scholar, but I regarded him as a deep thinker.

In the rugged school of practical life, his mind seemed to expand with age, which well fitted him for his new sphere of action in the political arena. He seemed to possess an unusual degree of strong common sense. In my intercourse with him I found him a strong partisan, but it was with him the outgrowth of positive conviction.

His patriotism was not bounded by State lines. He possessed the courage of his convictions under all circumstances.

He seemed to possess in a preëminent degree faith in his own party, and yet at times we see him rise above all party considerations and act in a way that he conceived to be for the good of all the people regardless of party.

Perhaps no member of this House drank deeper at the fountain of Democracy in his early youth than did Judge Houk.

He was not a dreamer, but an actor in the drama of life, and owing to his age and full manly development he was one of the most striking links between the mighty past and the living present.

His loyalty to his party and friends was not momentary, but enduring.

The people love a man whom they can trust, such a man was Judge Houk. A conviction to him was a living truth.

While I could not always agree with him, I did admire his sincerity and honesty of purpose.

In his death Ohio has lost an able and a faithful servant.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I will not attempt a biographical sketch of the life and character of George W. Houk. Others better qualified by long personal acquaintance will point out the special incidents and acts in his life. My acquaintance with him began with his election to the Fifty-second Congress. On one occasion I had the pleasure of enjoying the hospitality of his home. It is one's home life that most marks and illustrates personal characteristics. Mr. Houk's residence was 2 or 3 miles from the business center of the city of Dayton, which is the most beautiful city in the Miami Valley. At this point the upper plateau spreads out for 2 or 3 miles on either side of the river. The plains are level, and the soil is rich; and highly cultivated farms and gardens are spread out on every hand.

Skirting this fertile plain are the high hills which form the outer banks of the river and separate the valley from the uplands. Mr. Houk selected one of these hills, overlooking the city, as the place of his homestead. Many of the original forest trees are still preserved. Beautiful walks and drives have been laid out, and a plain but substantial building has been erected as the family residence. A large covered porch was built upon the side of the house overlooking the city. The view from this porch was one of rare beauty, and presented a landscape full of interest and fascination. Below lay the busy city. The tall chimneys, rising like monuments, pointed out the location of the great manufacturing institutions which have contributed so much to the wealth of the State and which furnish employment to so many people.

The tall spires of the churches indicate a high state of Christian civilization, and the broad and fertile plains, covered with farms and gardens, gave assurance that ample food supplies were near at hand. On a distant elevation was located the National Home for Disabled Soldiers, erected and supported by the National Government. The buildings accommodate with all home comforts from three to four thousand veterans of the late war, and the grounds are ornamented and kept in a manner which reflects credit upon the Government, and rival in magnificence the historical parks of the Old World.

It was this city, this valley and scene, which were spread out to the view of those who visited Mr. Houk's residence. He was accustomed, at the close of each day's work, to repair to his home, take his seat on this porch, and enjoy this beautiful panorama. His family vied with each other to contribute to his comfort and happiness. His was indeed a happy home, comprising within it all the rest, quiet, and comfort of the country and all the luxury and elegance of the city. This charming home life contributed greatly to the molding of his character, and especially fitted him for the career of usefulness and honor for which he was distinguished.

As a lawyer he was painstaking, studious, and faithful to the interests of his clients. He was not brilliant, but he was forceful in manner and strong in argument. As a legislator he was constantly at his post, fearless in the discharge of every duty, and always able and conscientious. As a member of the Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition in the last Congress he contributed greatly to the legislation which rendered that great enterprise a success, and the people of Illinois and of the whole country will forever hold him in grateful remembrance for his valuable services in this matter. As a citizen he was ever awake to the interests of the people, and in all respects acquitted himself as an able defender of the rights of the humble, and as an ardent advocate of the supremacy of the law.

As a friend he was ever true, faithful, and honorable. When his purpose was formed he adhered to it with tenacity, and never faltered in fealty. He was one of nature's noblemen, and his loss is deplored by all who knew him.

I was one of those appointed to accompany his remains to his home, and performed this sad duty as one who follows to the grave a near and dear friend. The services at the grave were the most impressive that I have ever witnessed. When the funeral dirge was chanted one of his daughters, the wife of a prominent citizen, joined in the singing. Her voice was lifted far above the voices of all others, and her face was illumined with such a halo of light that it seemed as if we were listening to the voice of an angel coming from above.

Before the last sad rite was performed his faithful and beloved wife addressed a few words to those assembled at the tomb. She did not appear as one stricken with grief, leaning on the arm of a relative, and convulsed with anguish; but she stood erect, with face upturned to Heaven, and assured those present that to her there was no such thing as death. That which seemed to many a dreaded monster was to her a welcome messenger to summon to a higher and better state of perpetual existence. Her faith took hold on immortality. She believed implicitly, and carried that belief into practical operation, that what we call death was but a summons from earthly cares to heavenly bliss. She could see beyond the tomb, could, with her eye of faith, pierce the veil that separates us from the world to come, and see the spirits of the departed enjoying the felicities of a home in Heaven.

The members of this House have in his death lost a most useful coworker, his State has lost one of her best and most distinguished citizens, and his wife had lost a faithful husband, and his children a kind and indulgent father.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, George W. Houk was a man whom to know was to admire and esteem. Although he had passed the sixty-eighth milestone in the journey of life, yet time had dealt so kindly with him that he did not even in appearance seem old, and the exuberance of his health and the keenness of his enjoyment of the companionship of his fellow-men made him always a welcome associate in every circle he chose to join.

His naturally genial disposition had not been soured by the experiences of a long and active career in a profession which perhaps more than any other affords opportunity for frequent insight into the meaner phases of human character and brings its members into frequent contact with the baser motives that too often constitute the springs of human conduct.

With all these exhibitions of character, motive, and conduct, he was undoubtedly familiar, as every lawyer must become whose practice has extended over a period of more than forty years; but instead of making him at all misanthropic, or distrustful of mankind, these very experiences seemed to render him more charitable in his judgments, more ready to palliate the offenses of others, more careful to see that he did not himself offend.

Accustomed as he was to deal with serious problems, and to consider questions of grave importance, these were not permitted to engross his thoughts to such an extent as to render him unobservant of or oblivious to the lighter and brighter incidents which go so far to relieve the professional life of the lawyer from what would otherwise be an exceedingly somber and unattractive coloring. On the contrary, these were the incidents and features of his experience which he treasured most, and from a seemingly inexhaustible fund of anecdote and reminiscence he was able to draw at will for the embellishment of an argument or the entertainment and pleasure of his friends.

He was a man of serene disposition and temperament, always taking the most cheerful view of a perplexing or discouraging situation, and capable of imparting to his associates the influence of the philosophy which so thoroughly dominated and controlled his own actions. Hence he was seldom confused as to the policy to be pursued in an emergency; his impulses were under the constant restraint of his judgment, and even the edicts of the caucus had but little effect in controlling his course when he had once determined for himself what his duty required him to do.

He was not, in the ordinary sense of the word, a politician; but in the broader, better, and truer sense of the term his title to that distinction was beyond question. He believed that "He serves his party best who serves his country best," and that party organization, discipline, and methods are only valuable as agencies for the recognition and establishment of certain principles of government through certain policies of legislation and administration.

The Democratic party, more nearly than any other, represented the essential political principles in which he believed, and so, always reserving to himself the exercise of the right of individual judgment, he became and remained a faithful adherent of that party, and in the councils of this body during his comparatively brief membership here he was one of its wisest, most intelligent, and prudent counselors, a thoughtful, sagacious, and trusted champion of the interests committed to his charge.

At the age of 26 years he became a member of the General Assembly of Ohio, and by reason of his recognized ability, learning, and fitness, was made chairman of the judiciary committee of that body, which position he held during the period immediately following the adoption of the present constitution of Ohio, and while that instrument was receiving its original interpretation and construction in the hands of a supreme court of which Allen G. Thurman and Rufus P. Ranney were members, one of the ablest courts that ever adorned the bench of any State.

That so distinguished an honor should have been conferred upon so young a man must be accepted as evidence not only of his high character and sterling worth, but of the recognition by those who knew him of the exceptional talents and sound learning afterward exhibited by him during his long career at a bar as eminent as any in the United States.

He was not merely a successful, but a scholarly lawyer; not simply the trained advocate and inquisitor familiar with the methods of the courts and the details of judicial procedure, but a diligent student, not alone of books but of men, finding in the one not merely an unfailing source of recreation and entertainment, but the means of pursuing with added zest the absorbing study of the other, and both contributed to make him what he was, the broad-minded, conscientious, painstaking legislator and lawyer, the patriotic, public-spirited citizen, the capable man of affairs, the wise statesman, the entertaining and instructive companion, the loyal, unselfish, and unfaltering friend.

Naturally such a man would become the idol of his own household, and his beautiful home overlooking the city of Dayton, and surrounded by the equally attractive homes of his children, bore evidence of his love for those to whom he represented so much of all they were accustomed to love and revere.

To that home and the idols that were templed there his thoughts were almost constantly recurring. It had been prepared, with all the care he could bestow, to become the retreat of his old age, as it had been the scene of his labors and enjoyments during the later years of his active business life; and to that end he had not only embellished it with whatever could add to its attractiveness and comfort in a physical sense, but had assembled in its library, as his permanent guests, the kindred spirits with whom he had been accustomed to commune and whose companionship had been to him a solace and an inspiration from his youth. He loved to talk of his home, he longed to return to it, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether he could have been persuaded again to leave it, unless in response to a most imperative call of public duty.

During his service here he was never obtrusive. He seldom occupied the time of the House, and never did so unless the occasion was such as to require an expression of his views upon a matter of pending legislation. But he was at all times keenly alert to whatever was transpiring upon the floor or in the committee rooms, and no man could have been more attentive to the interests of his constituents.

The largest soldiers' home in the United States is located in his district, and his attention to the welfare and interests of the inmates of that great institution was incessant and unfailing. No comrade could have been more solicitous in behalf of his comrades than he was in guarding the rights of this class of his constituents, the great majority of whom were his political opponents, but all of whom, I believe, were his personal friends. If they were not so the fault was not his, for no proposition that he believed might even remotely prejudice their interests was ever suffered by him to pass unchallenged.

He was a man of commanding presence and apparently in the enjoyment of robust health, destined to many years of usefulness. I parted from him on this floor only a few hours before his death, the news of which came to all of us as a surprise and was received with expressions of incredulity and amazement, but proved, alas, too true. The strong man had fallen, the firm grasp which he had seemed to have upon life had been suddenly loosened, and without other preparation than every man should at all times have he had been summoned to stand in the presence of the King of all Kingdoms.

On the following day, upon the announcement of his death, this House took such action as is customary and appropriate. Every token of sorrow for his death and of respect for his memory was manifested by his late associates, an unusual number of whom accompanied his body to its place of sepulture near the home where he would doubtless have preferred to die; and then the stream resumed its course, members again became intent upon the problems that daily challenge attention here, and all that remained of our brother was the impress he had made and left upon all who knew him.

When the circumstances of his own death are recalled I am reminded strongly of the brief but beautiful address delivered by him in this Hall on the day when tributes were being paid to the late Governor Warwick, in the course of which, speaking of the changes so frequently wrought in the membership of this House by death, he said:

> How forcibly are we reminded, by this ever-shifting scene, of the sublime apothegm of Burke, uttered by that great orator when, during a speech on the hustings, he was informed of the sudden death of his competitor. He at once cut short his speech, gathered up his papers, and exclaimed with touching pathos: "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue."

The address delivered by Judge Houk on that occasion was evidently unwritten and extemporaneous, and that this illustration, so singularly appropriate to be recalled to-day, should have occurred to him, may serve to prove that he was not wholly without warning of the peril in which he was even then standing and which he was not long to escape. But whether so or not is of small moment when we reflect how impotent must be every device of man to guard himself against the fate reserved for all the living. He has paid the debt so many are struggling to postpone, and whatever may have been his frailties or his faults, he has left behind him the record of a life filled with good deeds; to his surviving associates the recollections of an intercourse always agreeable and instructive; to his family the memory of a loving and indulgent husband and father; to his country the lasting benefit of the devotion of a faithful public servant.

May he rest in peace!

Mr. RICHARDS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, that eloquent and pathetic sentence, "In the midst of life we are in death," has been abundantly illustrated in this House during the last year. One of my first duties was as a member of a committee to go to a neighboring State and assist in paying the last sad tribute of of respect to a fellow-member, and from time to time our ranks have been thinned, two falling from my own State.

Statistics prove that the average length of human life is increasing, but not the average life of a member of Congress. This is not merely because many advanced in years or in feeble health are elected, for during the past year we have buried some who were men of vigorous constitution and robust health at the beginning of their term of service, and only a few days ago was buried one of the youngest members of the House.

We have had no epidemic among us, nor has contagion depleted our number. Our duties and requirements are not conducive to longevity. The faithful member, whether in his temporary home in the city or in his real home in his own State, finds his work a constant grind.

George W. Houk, to whose memory we to-day pay tribute, was a man of the people. He carried with him no traditions of superior ancestry, boasted no descent from some important personage, but was content that he was an American citizen from the rank and file; proud that he lived in a land where opportunity is afforded to even the humblest to carve his way to exalted station.

As school-teacher, lawyer, statesman, he ever sustained himself with credit, bearing evidence of a well-balanced mind that weighed well, and having considered, had capacity to act.

No egotism marked his intercourse with his fellow-men, but he was as modest as he was learned, as considerate as he was earnest.

He was not beset by vanity, and there was nothing dreamy or extravagant about him. He did not spring to his feet to speak upon every occasion, but carefully and calmly went about his work. He studied every question and voted upon it intelligently; and when he rose to speak there were no fanatical outpourings, no effort to convince by loud declamation, but his logical arguments showed that he had mastered his subject.

To him the chief office of a member was not how often his name might appear in the RECORD or be printed in some newspaper, but how he could best serve his constituents and his country by a careful performance of duty according to convictions born of earnest study.

With such representatives as he in Congress legislation can never be prostrated by the arts and influences of demagogues, but will be guided by that cardinal principle, "The greatest good to the greatest number."

We are facing a peculiar epoch in our history; a feeling of discontent is creeping over our hills and along our valleys, breeding in some instances lawlessness and crime.

The worshippers of Mammon are increasing, and too often the man of millions takes precedence over the patriot of brains. The arrogance of men who live in luxury sometimes drives the poor to almost desperate measures, and while the law must be respected and enforced, and the rights of property protected, it is our duty to ever keep in view the cardinal principle of the great declaration, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created free and equal." This is the keystone which supports the very fabric of our Government, which itself is supported by constitutional liberty, and which will be protected by Representatives whose hearts beat for the great masses of our people, and such a one was he to whose memory we to-day pay tribute.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, when the sable and unwelcome messenger of death served the summons of Heaven's High Chancellor on George W. Houk, he made no plea to the jurisdiction. No pretense or excuse of mortal avails to alter the decree of Him who speaks worlds into existence and to whom a thousand years are as a day. In the exalted plan of creation it is as necessary that men die as that they be born, but it is only the apathetic disciple of Zeno who does not feel the pangs of poignant sorrow when an associate and friend unexpectedly departs from a life of usefulness and honor.

It was my good fortune to be personally well acquainted with our deceased colleague, although I did not know him prior to his coming here as a member of this House, which was contemporaneous with mine.

Mr. Houk was born in Cumberland County, Pa., September 25, 1825. He moved to Ohio while very young and settled with his father at Dayton, which city was his home at the time of his death. He encountered the obstacles and surmounted the difficulties that beset the pedagogue, the law student, and the young attorney. He was admitted to the bar at the age of 21, and made the practice of the law the work of his life. He was a proficient, earnest, and successful lawyer, and took such an active interest in public affairs that he was elected as a member of the Ohio Legislature in 1852, in which body his ability was fittingly recognized, as evidenced by his appointment as chairman of the judiciary committee of the house.

By his sincerity, courage, and ability he won and retained the confidence and esteem of his party associates, who proved their appreciation of his high qualities of mind and heart by selecting him to fill many important places of trust and honor. I served with him on one of the committees of this House, and at a meeting of that committee held two days prior to his death he seemed to be in excellent health and spirits, and although his years were nearly three score and ten, yet none of us who met and conversed with him at that meeting thought that he, with his majestic bearing and magnificent physique, would be called so soon to pay his tribute to the King of Terrors.

The victories of William the Conqueror and all the other sovereigns of the English dynasties from Egbert to the present are mere bagatelles compared with the ravaging conquests of this arch enemy of life; but as man is not omniscient who can say that death is not a disguised blessing by which we are translated to the regions of the immortal, where paradisaical pleasures are omniprevalent, and sorrow is unknown.

The progress and invention of this age are marvelous, but with all our astonishing discoveries and all our phenomenal progress, our efforts to make human life perpetual are as futile and as evanescent in their results as were the efforts of Ponce de Leon in his search for the Fountain of Youth.

We can whisper across the sea and converse with the inhabitants of other continents, but we have no telephone communication with the grave. We can measure correctly the distances of the planets and describe minutely their every motion, but we can not trace the flight of the departing soul.

In coming years long after they shall have passed from earth we can reproduce the voice of our friends and the sermons and speeches of our preachers and statesmen, but nature will exhaust herself in vain to produce a mortal with genius to discover media by which communication could be established with those beyond the tomb.

We may illuminate the world with arc lights and incandescent lamps, but we can not make a searchlight to penetrate the least perceptible distance into the darkness of the mystery of death. In spite of the futility of human effort and the inconsequence of any mortal, yet George W. Houk did not live in vain. He carved out of hard conditions a monument to his memory of which his family and his friends may well be proud, and set an example which the youth of this favored land may well afford to emulate.

He is dead, but his good works and their beneficent influence will never die, but will be appreciated and remembered by the beneficiaries of his kind acts and good example, who will ever bear witness that the world is better for his having lived.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the late George W. Houk and myself entered Congress at the same time, and were assigned to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Our daily official intercourse on that committee soon ripened into personal friendship. I have met no man in public life who has impressed me as possessing more sterling qualities of head and heart. Leaving it to others who knew him longer than I did to speak of his personal history and the felicity of his social and domestic life, I desire to call attention to one or two characteristics of his public career which reflected honor on him while living, and which are worthy of emulation by those who live after him. He was in the fullest acceptation of the term an honest man.

I do not mean that he was merely honest in the sense that he avoided wrong doing. I mean that he had an honest mind, and courageously did his duty on all occasions according to the lights before him. He had none of the instincts of a demagogue or a time-server. If he believed a measure to be right and that it would result beneficially to the country, he had the courage to advocate and support it, without regard to its effect on his personal fortunes; and if he believed it to be wrong and hurtful in its results to the country, he would oppose it, notwithstanding in doing so he might run counter to a misguided public sentiment in its favor.

A man of education, a student of books, and an observer of current events, he possessed varied information and was thoroughly trained for the public service. Thus equipped and endowed he necessarily took high rank among his associates. Modest and unobtrusive, it required time and opportunity to know him at his worth. It was in the committee room where legislation is considered and perfected that he appeared to the greatest advantage. The highest meed of praise that can be bestowed on the memory of any man is to say that when living he was most respected and loved by those who knew him best, and this can truthfully be said of our lamented friend.

He possessed another quality in a preëminent degree. He was a patriot. He loved his country and his whole country. Its history, its traditions, and its achievements were all familiar to him and swelled his bosom with pride. He contemplated its future growth and development with enthusiam. I do not recall that he ever addressed the House when his country was not his theme. He was a robust American. No "pent up Utica contracted" his patriotic aspirations. Neither faction nor section had attractions for him. It required his country and every part of his country to fill the measure of his patriotism. He loved American institutions as an inestimable heritage from a patriotic ancestry, and guarded the Constitution which vouchsafed them to posterity as the Israelites guarded the ark of the covenant.

The stalwart patriotism of such a man is worthy of comment and emulation in these latter days when Americanism is dimmed and discredited by the propagation of ideas which have been transplanted from foreign countries to our shores. It is the example of such men as George W. Houk which gives assurance of a broader, a deeper, and a more enduring national life; and justifies the belief that we are approaching a period of national glory when sectional pride and differences will no longer exist, when the enemies of social order and good government will nowhere be tolerated, and the Republic, its flag, and its institutions, will everywhere be cherished by the American people as the title to happiness and prosperity.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, my limited acquaintance with the Hon. George W. Houk does not qualify me to speak of him except in relation to his professional and public life. Ever since I have been a practicing lawyer I have had some knowledge of Mr. Houk, who was an attorney residing in the city of Dayton, in Montgomery County, Ohio. His reputation as a lawyer and a citizen was not limited to his immediate locality. There were few men more highly esteemed than he for devotion to truth. He was free from the cunning and trickery which are sometimes the principal weapons of successful lawyers.

The fact that Mr. Houk was able to achieve a very high standing at the bar of Montgomery County is proof of his ability and perseverance. He was a member of the General Assembly from Montgomery County in 1853, and was three times the Democratic candidate for Congress in the Third district, and was twice elected.

The city of Dayton is located in the beautiful and fertile valley of the Great Miami River. Long before the organization of the State of Ohio the Indians had settled in the Miami Valley, and because of the superior advantages of that locality they resisted all efforts of the white race to invade their territory. But eventually the superior civilization of the white race in its westward course overcame the obstacles interposed by the Indians, and the rich valley became the abode of a very intelligent and enterprising people. Some of the most talented representative men of this country resided in the city of Dayton.

It was here that Hon. Clement L. Vallandigham lived, and from which place he was sent to Congress. It is scarcely necessary to mention the characteristics of this great Democratic leader, especially during the exciting war period. He was the champion of that faction of Ohio Democrats who were opposed to a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion. He was arrested, tried, and convicted by court-martial, and sentenced to imprisonment during the war. But Mr. Lincoln commuted the sentence to banishment into the enemy's lines. But notwithstanding his opposition during the war, Mr. Vallandigham was one of the first to declare in favor of accepting the validity of all the amendments to the Constitution. Having made a determined fight against the policy of Mr. Lincoln during the war, he had that independence of character which made it easy for him to acknowledge defeat and frankly recognize the duty of all people to accept the results as conclusive of the issues involved in the war.

From the city of Dayton also came to Congress another one of Ohio's greatest public men, Hon. Robert C. Schenck. I think I shall not transcend the truth when I say that it is doubtful if any district was ever represented in Congress by an abler man than Gen. Schenck. He was a Republican, and took part in the debates during the reconstruction period, displaying great thought and statesmanship.

In the county of Montgomery, near the city of Dayton, is located the Central Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. It is the largest of its kind in the world. Here the disabled and helpless veterans of the wars of the Union are provided with food, clothing, and shelter. The inmates of that institution are a part of the constituency of the district represented by the Hon. George W. Houk.

Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the foregoing facts for the purpose of affording some information concerning the people whom Mr. Houk had the honor to represent; and I think I may safely say that Mr. Houk was well qualified to represent that district, and fully sustained himself as one of the most efficient and useful members of Congress. He was always conservative and safe. He seldom took part in debate, but when he spoke his remarks were clear and candid. He was a careful listener, and a good judge of the merits of all measures. He was not disposed to follow extremists of his own party beyond the bounds of reason and justice; and when party dictation compelled him to yield support to doubtful measures he did it reluctantly and with regret.

In my personal relations with Mr. Houk I found him to be possessed of the qualities and demeanor of a gentleman. He was inclined to be quiet and unobtrusive in his intercourse with his fellow-members, but was never disagreeable or unsocial when approached by anyone. The success which he attained as a lawyer, the excellent character which he bore among his people at home, and his high standing as a member of this and the last Congress, are sufficient tributes to his worth and character.

Mr. SORG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that any member who may wish to print in the RECORD remarks upon the subject of these resolutions may have permission to do so.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

And then, in accordance with the resolutions already adopted, the House (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7097) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL.] The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, strike out lines 19, 20, and 21 and insert:

For the care and maintenance of horses and vehicles used for carrying the mails and other transportation required for the uses of the Senate, $3,500: Provided, That the offer of a responsible person shall be accepted who shall give satisfactory bond and security to perform the service required by the Senate with the present outfit of horses and vehicles and with the use of the stables belonging to the Senate for one-third less than the cost in the fiscal year ending on the 1st of July, 1894.

Mr. CALL. When the Senate concurred in the amendments adopted as in Committee of the Whole it was agreed that the amendments which I had to offer might be submitted in the Senate. I was engaged at the time in looking over the amendments that I had prepared. That being the understanding, as I have some other amendments to offer in connection with the library and the Supreme Court, I ask that the pending amendment be withdrawn for the present, until I can present and take the sense of the Senate upon the amendments in connection with the library.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CALL. On page 122, after line 4, I move to insert:

One clerk for the Supreme Court, to be employed by the Chief Justice, at $2,500, for the service of the court in obtaining books and making notes of reference, and such other duties as may be required; and one messenger for the court, at $750, to be employed by the Chief Justice for the convenience of the court and the removal of books.

Mr. MILLS. I raise the point of order that the amendment changes the general law and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. The Senate has decided this case already. I hope the Chair will not have any hesitation about settling the matter.

Mr. CALL. I should like to have the decision of the Chair, and I should like to be heard on the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Florida. The Chair was unable to hear the suggestion of the Senator from Texas as to his point of order.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that the amendment is general legislation on an appropriation bill. It is the same point of order that was made and sustained by the Senate four times on Saturday.

Mr. CALL. The point of order was sustained without a yea-and-nay vote by half a dozen Senators.

Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be heard on this subject. The proposition is too unreasonable for any body of men to maintain and defend. Let us examine it. The rule says "general legislation." It is manifest, therefore, that general legislation is not legislation alone, but that there must be some other kind of legislation. If there be general legislation, there must be legislation which is not general. No one will deny that proposition. What legislation is there that is not general and what legislation is there that is general? What does the term mean? Every time two or three members of this body desire to make an objection to the passage of any provision on an appropriation bill the senseless cry of general legislation is made. Let us see.

Let us not have positive affirmations of opinion, but let us be a body capable of reasoning and of argument. Now, what is general legislation? What does the term mean? Is it general in respect to what? Is it unlimited and general in respect to time, as that the amendment shall not be permanent, indefinite, continuous? Is it general when it is limited? Or is it particular and not general and as opposed to that which is general? Is it general in respect that it shall embrace the whole country or a part of the country? What does the term mean? If it means anything at all, it means that legislation which concerns the great body of the people.

Now, is it said that an act of Congress providing that money shall be paid to an individual upon conditions, being a change in the conditions upon an appropriation for a private bill affecting a particular person only, is general legislation? In one sense of the word, every penny that comes out of the Treasury is general legislation. That is the sense of the proposition of the Senator from Maine, and he might as well say here that every act and amendment that takes a penny out of the Treasury is general legislation and can not be put upon an appropriation bill; for "general" means either the whole country or the greater part of it, or some particular quality, as in reference to time—that it shall be unlimited, permanent, and continuous.

But, Mr. President, the term "general legislation" has a meaning, and that meaning is that it is that which does not concern a particular tribunal, a particular person, a particular class or set of men, but that it embraces the body politic in its essential qualities and character. That is the only sensible meaning which you can give to general legislation in the sense of this rule. If you mean to say that it changes existing law, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], with logic apparent and conclusive on its face, showed that every appropriation is a change of existing law, and every provision of the bill, when it comes annually under the command of the Constitution to the two Houses for an appropriation, is a change of existing law. It makes law where there was none before and where it had expired.

But outside of that, what is there in this bill that these objections should be made, when every judge of the Supreme Court desires, if we are to believe the statements of Senators HOAR, VEST, WOLCOTT, and DAWES in the last Congress, this change; when every committee of the Senate to which it has ever been referred desires it; when the two colleagues of the Senator from Texas, the majority of his Committee on the Library, favor this change? He stands alone in defiance of his committee in making these points of order here.

Mr. MILLS. I will state that the matter has not been investigated by the Library Committee

Mr. CALL. I think that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] is a member of that committee, and here in the RECORD is his speech in the last session of Congress, which I have read, openly affirming his support of it. The speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the other associate on the committee of the Senator from Texas, is also in the RECORD, and I read it Saturday, affirming the recommendation and support of this proposition. So, long before the Senator from Texas came upon that committee, the majority of the committee had expressed and affirmed their support of these propositions.

But what is this? I introduce an amendment providing that the Supreme Court shall appoint a clerk. Senators get up and say that that concerns the Library. What possible connection is there between giving the Supreme Court this facility for the purposes of their convenient use of the Library and the organization of the Library?

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] the other day made a point that this amendment proposed to change the existing law. I have examined the statutes, and the statutes in express terms contradict his statement. The statute uses the phrase that "the following assistants," naming them, "shall be appointed by the Librarian;" and those assistants have passed away years and years ago.

As I stated in my first observations, there is no law which today affects the assistants named in the law of 1836. To avoid that, however, I have introduced a provision here that a clerk of the Supreme Court shall be appointed, to serve the conveniences of the court in respect to the use of the Law Library for obtaining the necessary books desired by them for the points and notes of reference, which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], a member of the Judiciary Committee, for years a justice of the supreme court of the State of Mississippi, and a lawyer who has no superior in this body or out of it, has testified that he has made use of the library, and found the services of the present assistant law librarian in that capacity of necessity and of great service to him.

When I introduced this amendment upon that authority, sustained by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, sustained by a majority of the Committee on the Library, sustained by the passage of a bill containing a similar provision at the last session of the Senate, sustained by the request, as I have it, from the statement of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] given to me by others, and no doubt correct—because this record here shows it to be correct—sustained by the wishes of every judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, this point is continuously made.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that there is no more propriety in asserting that an amendment which affects one person is general legislation than there is in saying that it is no legislation. "General" must have some meaning. What is it? Does it mean one person? Is that the meaning of general? Does it mean two persons or three persons or a small part? Does it not mean the greater part? How much more than the greater part might be a question. It means that which affects the people of the United States in general, all of them, and not that which chiefly affects individuals or a small part of the people of the United States.

There are such things as private bills, private interests, class legislation, which do not concern the body politic, do not concern the whole people of the United States; and there are bills and subjects which concern the greater part of the people of the United States, and it is that character of legislation, referring to the continuous and permanent laws affecting the body politic, the economies of legislation, and not special interests, that we have a rule of the Senate which says you shall not offer on an appropriation bill an amendment for a private claim, unless under particular conditions and circumstances.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida was in conflict with the third paragraph of Rule XVI, which says that:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

I make the further point of order that the amendment violates the first paragraph of Rule XVI, which reads:

1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

The first proposition is that the amendment proposes general legislation on an appropriation bill; and it is only necessary for me to state what I stated on Saturday, when there were not so many Senators present as there are now, that the object of the rule was to confine the appropriations of the Government to the Appropriations Committee, and to confine the Appropriations Committee to appropriations made under existing law to carry on the administration of the Government. That is their special duty; that is their function, under the rules of the Senate, to make the appropriations required by the mandates of the law, and nothing else. Everything outside of that is general legislation—legislation affecting various subjects.

The reason for that provision, Mr. President, as we all know, is that the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses are the two busiest committees of the two bodies. They have their hands full; they are constantly investigating items of appropriation in the numerous bills, each of which is as large as an ordinary volume. They do not have the time to investigate general legislation that is proposed to be ingrafted upon the bills, and therefore that proposed legislation must be sent to a committee to be investigated before it shall be incorporated in an appropriation bill.

The other provision of the rule proves the position which I take to be unassailable, and that is, that no amendment shall be incorporated in an appropriation bill until it shall have received the investigation and sanction of some committee of the body; and here is an amendment which has received the sanction of no committee.

This body is known all over the country for its courtesy; it stands upon its courtesy among its own members; and here is the Senator from Florida insisting on running over the Committee on the Library, to whom the Senate under its rules commits this question. We have not had an opportunity to investigate and report upon it. So far from it having been reported by the Committee on the Library, it has not even been reported by the committee of which the Senator is a member, the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee is opposing it here upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. If I understand the Senator, he is bringing out a point that is entirely new to me in this matter. Does the Senator say that this amendment has not been reported by any committee? I got the impression from what the Senator from Florida stated that the amendment had the support of the Committee on the Library. I do not know that the Senator did say exactly that.

Mr. MILLS. The amendment has never been reported or examined by the Committee on the Library since I have been a member of it, and I am chairman of that committee.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator from Florida has nothing whatever to go on. I thought the Senator from Florida had the report of a committee to sustain him.

Mr. MILLS. No. The Senator from Florida reported the utterances of two gentlemen who are now on the Committee on the Library, but who at the time the utterances were made were not members of the Committee on the Library, as I understand.

Mr. CALL. I beg pardon, they were.

Mr. MILLS. One was, and one was not. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] I think was not.

Mr. CALL. I beg pardon.

Mr. MILLS. He took the place of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], as I understand.

Mr. HALE. If the Committee on the Library, which has this whole matter in charge, has not reported in favor of the amendment, what little strength it ever had is gone.

Mr. MILLS. It has not been reported by the Committee on the Library.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a question of order. This precise question, as I understand, was decided four times on Saturday, and I do not know why the time of the Senate should be taken up in listening to a discussion between Senators on this question of order. Of course, I understand this matter is within the discretion of the Presiding Officer; but it seems to me this discussion ought not to be allowed to go on indefinitely, when the Senate itself has acted upon it so recently and so emphatically.

Mr. MILLS. I will conclude what I was going to say by simply adding that I have sought to have an opportunity to investigate this thing. I want to confer with the judges of the Supreme Court about it. I have not heard one word from them on the subject. I have conferred, however, with the Librarian, a most excellent gentleman and a most competent officer, as everyone will testify. I have known him for twenty-one years, and I have never known a more competent, a more affable, polite, and courteous gentleman. He is opposed to this amendment.

In common with other Senators, I have been so busy with the tariff question that I have not had an opportunity to investigate this thing as I desire to do, and I want to have during the recess of Congress an opportunity to look into it. This is a very big question, proposing to rend this great Library in twain. The law part of this Library belongs to the Congressional Library, held by these two bodies in their own hands, and they do not give the control of it away to anybody; and now here comes a proposition, supported by one Senator, who is proposing to break down the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress as to the law part of this great Library of the country. I at least ask that the Senate will give the Committee on the Library an opportunity to investigate and report upon that question.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say a word. It is always proper that a matter should be stated fairly, and should not be decided upon statements that are entirely incorrect. That is due to every question. There is no argument in stating propositions which do not rest upon facts nor in a body deciding a case which does not rest upon the facts of the case, not meaning to impeach anybody's intention.

Mr. MILLS. What I have stated are facts.

Mr. CALL. I do not undertake to dispute what the Senator says; but I dispute this part of it. I say substantially it is true that while the Library Committee may not have had a meeting since the Senator from Texas has been a member of the committee, the record shows that the Library Committee, constituted in its membership as it is now——

Mr. MILLS. Not the committee, but a member of it.

Mr. CALL. That committee, with the exception of the Senator from Texas, in an open and exhaustive debate in this body at the last session, affirmed their approval and recommendation.

Mr. MILLS. Not at the last session.

Mr. CALL. It is not material whether it was to-day or yesterday or the day before or this session or the last session. The substantial question is not as to time, but as to the facts, whether the Library Committee, whether the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, whether the Senate itself, whether the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, and whether all the judges of the Supreme Court have not affirmed and approved this amendment. That is the question to which the Senator from Texas should have addressed himself, and not as to the merits of the Librarian or the rending of the great library in two. How? This amendment has never been decided out of order, nor any amendment cognate to it, nor has any amendment resembling it which has ever been before this body.

This amendment proposes to reduce the appropriation contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and, therefore, it is not subject to the objection. Any Senator can move an amendment to an appropriation bill which does not increase the amount, and which is not general legislation. This amendment reduces the number, and substitutes, in place of it, a clerk of the Supreme Court, who may be employed by the Chief Justice for what? To enable the court to use the books required by them to make notes of reference; a man of the skill and ability, such as this gentleman who has been spoken of here, who has the confidence of the Supreme Court, to be employed as the clerk. The Senator from Mississippi, in his investigations of law questions, has availed himself of the services of this gentleman to make notes of reference from the law books and decisions of the courts.

This lawyer in charge of the Law Library has had the appropriation taken away from him which was provided by law, as appears in this debate, and the Senator from Texas is here justifying it. He is given $1,200 a year, which is less than is paid to the experienced, capable, and intelligent colored employé who attends to the books in the Law Library; this man used by the court in gathering and making notes of the books required in great and important cases, which are being considered there and decided by that tribunal, is receiving but $1,200 a year, and the valuable and capable colored man receives $1,400, and the committee has no time to investigate the subject.

We decide points of order here. The Senator from Texas did not and can not tell us in any sensible proposition what "general legislation" is except by contrasting it with particular and special legislation. He can not do it. There is otherwise no meaning to the term. This amendment does not increase the appropriation; it reduces it. It reduces the number of assistants in the Library; it relieves them from the work which they are required to do for the Supreme Court, and it gives to the Supreme Court a clerk at $2,500 a year to enable it to facilitate its use of the law books and for making points of reference in the court.

It relates to the judiciary, and it is offered to the clause of the bill relating not to the Library, but to the judicial department of the Government. There is where the amendment belongs and the subject to which it relates.

It is true it serves the same end as the other; but I venture to say that no amendment like this, no amendment in terms resembling this, no amendment which has any connection with this, except that it should have the same use, has been decided by the Senate to be out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the question, Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida in order?

Mr. CALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAREY. I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], but in order to make a quorum I have the privilege of voting, and I will let my vote stand.

Mr. QUAY. I am advised by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] that his colleague [Mr. MORGAN], with whom I am paired, would vote the same way as I do on this question, and I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have the right to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have the right to vote to make a quorum, and I vote "yea."

Mr. CAREY. In order to make a quorum, I vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP. I transfer my pair with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CAREY (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to withdraw my vote. I understand there is a quorum without my vote. I broke my pair and voted in order to make a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—15.

So the amendment was not received.

Mr. CALL. On page 18, line 13, the compensation of the Librarian is fixed at $4,000, and there are thirty assistant librarians provided for, all appointed by the chief Librarian. It reads "for thirty assistant librarians, two at $2,500 each." After the word "each" I propose to insert "one of whom shall have charge of the Law Library and be employed on the recommendation of the Chief Justice."

Mr. HALE. That is the same thing.

Mr. MILLS. I make the same point of order on the amendment. It is the same case in different form. This is the sixth time it has been presented, and five times the Senate has voted that it is not in order.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order. Certainly it is high time. I ask for the decision of the Chair on the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "each," in line 15, page 18, insert:

One of whom shall have charge of the Law Library and be employed by the Chief Justice.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I object to debate. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow me to say a single word.

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida, that the point of order being made, he can proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CALL. I understand that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Florida proceeding?

Mr. HALE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order having been made, the Chair is compelled, the Senate having repeatedly determined this question, to sustain the point of order. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida is not in order.

Mr. CALL. I make a further motion to amend the bill. In line 14, page 18, I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-six."

Mr. President, I wish to say a word about the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the amendment be stated.

Mr. CALL. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 14, page 18, strike out the word "thirty" and insert "twenty-six;" so as to read:

For twenty-six assistant librarians.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine gains nothing by the motion excluding me from saying a few words on this question. Here is a library of 85,000 volumes, increasing at the rate of two or three thousand a year, certified by every judge of the supreme judicial tribunal to require special care and attention, certified to be in charge of a man capable of giving that care, and the request is made that the court shall have some kind of supervision over the special officer charged with the duty of providing conveniences for the court.

Substantially this amendment and this request of the judges of the Supreme Court, certified to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], by Senator Dawes, by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in the record which I have read to the Senate, passed by the Senate of the United States, recommended by the Judiciary Committee, struck off the bill in general conference, is denied. The absolute power of appointment of the thirty assistants, without knowledge or recommendation from any Department of this Government, is confided to one single man, and the court's wishes are treated with disrespect and the mandate of the Senate in its former session is treated with disrespect. We stand in this position, and we can not escape it before the country. Here is a bill full of general legislation. Here is a rule which, if the construction that Senators put upon it is correct, is as binding upon the Committee on Appropriations as on any Senator or the members of any other committee of the Senate.

Members of the Senate derive no additional functions from being upon the Committee on Appropriations. They have no additional rights. They are not superior to any other Senators. If it be out of order to put upon an appropriation bill general legislation, it is as much so when proposed by members of the Committee on Appropriations as when suggested by other members. That is a poposition which can not be controverted. They have no more right to change the laws and put legislative provisions upon an appropriation bill than has any other Senator, nor have they the right to exclude such propositions from the consideration of this body. The rule of the Senate does not say that the Committee on Appropriations can put general legislation upon an appropriation bill. It is equally prohibitory upon them.

What does the pending bill do? It changes the entire administrative methods of the Treasury Department of the United States. It revolutionizes them. It dismisses hundreds of employés and creates new offices without limit and without the sanction of existing law, thus changing the law and abolishing it.

Yet we stand here, by what strange magic I know not, to resist a little request of the Supreme Court and the judges of it, made substantially, if not in terms, as proved in the RECORD by the testimony of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] at the last Congress; by Mr. Dawes, then in charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], as quoted in the debate, speaking of personal conferences with the judges, and by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], of the Library Committee, and sustained by the whole Senate.

Yet the bill can, at the request of two or three members, have in it legislation changing the entire method of doing business in, and the entire character of, the Treasury Department in its different bureaus and affecting the whole body politic of the country in its most important Department.

We stand before the country professing to reason and to argue, and we say that an amendment which requires one assistant librarian to be appointed by the Librarian, with the approval of the Supreme Court, is out of order because it is general legislation in a bill of general legislation, changing the whole existing law. If the Senate can stand it, I can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand a letter from Hon. M. A. SMITH, the Delegate from the Territory of Arizona, dated July 16, 1894, calling attention to the absolute necessity of an increase in the amount provided for the office of the surveyor-general of the Territory of Arizona and for clerk hire in his office. The amount is estimated at $8,000. On page 106, line 13, I move to strike out the word "seven" and insert "eight," so as to read "$8,000," to correspond with the estimates.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, page 106, before the word "thousand," strike out the word "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to read: "$8,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. In the items for office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate, on page 6, line 8, I move, after the word "each," to strike out the word "laborer" and insert the words "two laborers," so as to read: "Two laborers in charge of the private passage;" and to strike out in the 12th line the words "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-four;" so as to read:

Twenty-four laborers, at $720 each.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that this amendment does not increase the appropriation in the bill. It is moved for the purpose of restoring to the rolls of the Senate an aged man who has been in the service of the Senate for thirty years, a crippled man who has no other means of earning a livelihood, who has served the Senate until he is unable to do anything else, and who has a family dependent upon him for support.

A large majority of the members of the Senate on both sides have signed a request that a provision should be made for this man, and such an amendment was referred to the Committee on Contintingent Expenses, but owing to changes and other matters it has not been reported to this body. A majority of the Senators and all the employés here are interested in this amendment. The man is capable of rendering efficient service.

As I said, for thirty years he has been in the faithful service of this body. He is a cripple. I understand he is an intelligent, faithful, efficient, capable man for the duty which he has performed. I have no interest in it. I know him only as others know him; he is not from the State which I represent in part, and I only feel that it is becoming to the dignity of this body that they should not turn out upon the highways to starve a man with a dependent family who has become disabled in the service of the Senate for any other business than that which he may perform here; and he is as capable of performing this business as any other man.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to and that the Senate of the United States will not set the example of taking a civilian and placing him upon a pension roll of Senate officers.

Mr. CALL. I do not expect the support of the Senator from Missouri, but I wish to antagonize the sentiment which he expresses, and I hold that in any body benevolence and humanity and consideration for the poor should form a part of the public policy of the Government, and that a contrary policy is barbarous, uncivilized, and unworthy of this enlightened age.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I have another amendment to offer. On page 8, beginning in line 19, I move to strike out the following clause:

For expenses of maintaining and equipping horses and mail wagons for carrying the mails, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

And to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out lines 19, 20, and 21 on page 8, and insert:

For the care and maintenance of horses and vehicles used for carrying the mails and other transportation required for the uses of the Senate, $5,500: Provided, That the offer of a responsible person shall be accepted, who shall give satisfactory bond and security to perform the service required by the Senate with the present outfit of horses and vehicles and with the use of the stables belonging to the Senate for one-third less than the cost in the fiscal year ending on the 1st of July, 1894.

Mr. CALL. The clause I move to strike out is perhaps the most extravagant provision of the extravagences of this bill. Here is a provision of $5,000 for what? To take care of eleven horses. It would cost at the outside about $110 a month to feed these horses and provide for their proper care and maintenance, while for them with three or four mail wagons for the use of the Senate, a stable being provided, $5,000 is appropriated.

There are hundreds of people in this city who will agree to perform that service for one-half that amount, and perform it efficiently. No one knows anything at all about the cost of this work, but it is quite evident that it is preposterous. The idea of appropriating $5,000 for eleven horses, stable being provided rent free for three or four wagons! I wish to say it is an extravagant appropriation, and I propose the amendment. I ask for a vote upon it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move to insert, at the end of the 26th section, page 143, the following proviso:

Provided, That the duties, devolved by the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, upon a Joint Commission to Inquire into and Examine the Status of Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, etc., shall, after the passage of this act, and until the 4th day of March, 1895, be performed on the part of the Senate by the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments.

This merely transfers from one committee of the Senate to another certain duties which legitimately belong to a standing committee of the Senate. It is not important. It expires on the 4th day of March next. I think it will not be objected to.

Mr. CALL. I can not permit that to pass, although I am heartily in accord with the Senator from Vermont, without showing to the country the character of the proceedings here. Here is an amendment to a bill which contains general legislation in the most important particulars, which changes an entire Department of this Government, put upon it by Senators calling themselves a joint commission. They are no more than individual Senators, for the commission gives them no other function.

Under a rule which they claim prohibits all general legislation, five or six times they have affirmed that anything is general legislation which changes existing law by a deliberate vote of this body, and now the Senator from Vermont proposes to do, what? To abrogate and repeal what they claim to be a statute.

It is true, I say, that it was in contravention of the Constitution of the United States most palpable that this so-called joint commission was created, a legislative body appointed by the dead officers of an expired Congress and charged with the living function of representing a new and live Congress, expending large sums of public money, employing experts, changing the entire character of one of the Departments without the authority of this body as expressed in the form and requirements of the Constitution.

But yet Senators claim it to be a statute, and this amendment of my friend the Senator from Vermont is predicated upon the idea that the Senate of the United States has not the constitutional power of providing its own rules of procedure implied in the term "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings," and yet that a proceeding of the Senate created by a statute of the United States commanding it to pursue a particular method has to be abrogated by a provision upon an appropriation bill, which the Senate has decided can not contain any general legislation, but is to be abrogated by an amendment to the statutes.

Mr. President, this is all I have to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROCTOR. I hardly understood whether the Senator from Florida opposes or favors the amendment.

Mr. CALL. I do not oppose it. I only wanted to call attention to the fact that what is accorded to the Senator from Vermont was denied to the Supreme Court, and is denied to other Senators upon this floor. No point of order is raised by me.

Mr. PROCTOR. I trust the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2015) granting to the Columbia Irrigation Company a right of way through the Yakima Indian Reservation in Washington.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6748) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GORMAN, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. HALE were appointed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5481, being the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5481) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be considered as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection that course will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 2, line 8, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one messenger, $480," and insert "one stenographer and typewriter, $720;" in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "clerk, nine hundred," and insert "deputy property clerk, one thousand;" on page 3, line 5, after the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred and forty-one," and insert "four hundred and eighty-one;" so as to read:

For executive office: For two Commissioners, at $5,000 each; one Engineer Commissioner, $1,768 (to make salary $5,000); one secretary, $2,160; one clerk, $1,500; one clerk, $1,400; three clerks, one of whom shall be a stenographer and tppewriter, at $1,200 each; one messenger, $600; one stenographer and typewriter, $720; one driver, $480; one inspector of buildings, $2,400; one assistant inspector of buildings, $1,200; two assistant inspectors of buildings, at $1,000 each; and one of the assistant inspectors of buildings shall hereafter also perform the duties of inspector of elevators and fire escapes, without additional compensation; one clerk, $1,600; one clerk, $900; one messenger, $480; one janitor, $700; one laborer at $1 per day, $313; two laborers, at $360 each; one steam engineer, $900; one property clerk, $1,600; one deputy property clerk, $1,000; one clerk, $720; one messenger clerk, $600; one messenger, $180; three watchmen, at $480 each; one chief inspector of plumbing, $2,000; four assistant inspectors of plumbing, at $1,000 each: one harbor master, $1,200; in all, $46,481.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 3, to insert the following proviso after line 6:

Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of Josiah Dent, Thomas P. Morgan, and William J. Twining, late Commissioners of the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized and directed to credit and allow audit No. 1577, made in favor of John F. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. At the end of line 13 of the amendment, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, after line 13, it is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting:

That section 3 of the act approved August 30, 1890, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and for other purposes," shall not be construed to apply to the condemnation of land for public highways, nor to repeal chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia in regard to public highways, roads, and bridges.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to better understand this provision, and I have no doubt the Senator in charge of the bill can satisfy me.

It is proposed to extend North Capitol street to the grounds of the Soldiers' Home. I suppose it is an accepted proposition, and all the citizens interested understand, that that is to be done in any event. In doing that, an opening is to be made in the Prospect Hill Cemetery. A street 130 feet wide passes through the cemetery, in a general way parallel to the western side of the cemetery, a distance from the south 172 feet to the west line of the cemetery, and on the north side perhaps 200 feet, leaving a rather irregular piece of the cemetery on the west side, and in a sense destroying the whole cemetery, for it leaves 10 acres on the east side, which is not very likely to be used hereafter for a cemetery, whereas the original inclosure comprised 17 acres.

By the act approved December 21, 1893, Congress authorized the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to condemn the lands of Prospect Hill Cemetery and Annie E. Barbour for the extension of North Capitol street from T street to the Soldiers' Home. As I have said, the act provided under what law the condemnation should be made, appropriated the amount necessary to pay the judgment of condemnation, and provided that the appropriation should be immediately available. The Commissioners of the District instituted proceedings in court to have the land condemned, and the court appointed three real estate experts, Albert F. Fox, William B. Gurley, and Oceola C. Green.

The last two of those gentlemen I know, and from my own knowledge can state that no better men could be found for such a purpose; and I have no doubt that is true of all three of them. These men were appointed commissioners to ascertain and report the value of the land proposed to be taken and the amount of benefits and damages. These commissioners were in session many days, heard many witnesses on both sides, and finally reported that the value of the land proposed to be taken from the cemetery, 2.893 acres, was $45,725, and that the damage to the remaining land of the cemetery was $5,962.

The commissioners had been instructed that they were to value the land according to its value as cemetery land. This instruction was in conformity with the decision of the Supreme Court. They allowed to the cemetery company about 36 cents per square foot for the land taken. The cemetery company's price for the land is 55 cents per square foot.

The District Commissioners objected to this report. I do not know why in the case of the cemetery. The court overruled the exceptions, affirmed the report as to values, and denied both benefits and damages. The District Commissioners appealed to the court of appeals, and the case is now pending there.

This paragraph which it is now proposed to insert in the bill directs the supreme court of the District of Columbia to vacate its order confirming the report of the commissioners appointed to determine the value of the land.

It strikes a lay man—I call myself a layman though I studied law once—as rather a singular proceeding as a legal proposition to order a court to vacate one of its orders. I submit that the owners are entitled to whatever the law gives them. There is no charge of fraud; there is no expression of dissatisfaction on the part of the cemetery company particularly, though of course they are very sorry to have their cemetery nearly ruined by this operation, and there is nothing to be said, I suppose, except that the District Commissioners think that the price is too large, and perhaps that there is no assessment for damages. That is perhaps a question.

In the case of the Annie E. Barbour property these same Commissioners say the damages were $21,000—I give round numbers—and the benefits $18,000, and that was affirmed by the court. Now, I am told in explanation that the act providing for obtaining the site for a new city post-office omitted any provision for charging benefits; but in that case the Government took a whole square, and it did not consider there were any benefits to be assessed. It merely paid for the whole square of ground, and omitted to provide for the benefits. It is said that that law took the place of the old law upon the subject, and that thereafter no benefits should be charged. Nevertheless, the proceeding under which this cemetery ground was condemned was perfectly lawful, and is perfectly lawful to-day, and whatever dispute there is about it is in court, where it is likely to be settled equitably.

I became accidentally quite familiar with this question through some German friends. I should say for myself that there are no benefits in this case. The road cuts down about 16 feet, and the Commissioners allowed a sum of money for the revetment that will be necessary along that steep bank, and I doubt very much whether the strip of land on the west side will ever be worth very much for building land. Nobody likes to have a cemetery at a distance of 120 feet from his dwelling, and there will be no desirable building lots there. Nobody will give a full price and nobody will give the price at which the land is held for cemetery purposes, that is to say, 55 cents a square foot. Even if this provision is passed and is accepted the matter through the process of condemnation is again sent to the Commissioners.

It does not follow, in my judgment, that the finding will be any different. The Commissioners found no benefits in this case, but they did find benefits in the Annie E. Barbour case, notwithstanding the city post-office act. It appears to me evident that they did not intend to charge any benefits on account of the strip of land. The cutting of the road through does not benefit that piece of land for cemetery purposes, and it turns the cemetery company into a building association.

Therefore, I do not see why there should be any objection to a proviso sanctioning, if you choose, subject to the decision of the court where the matter now is, the finding in the case of the cemetery. That is the question I should like to submit to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] who, I understand, has paid some attention to this matter. Why should that exception be made, and what is the matter with the finding of those commissioners?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that the amendment submitted here by the Committee on Appropriations is an amendment which was sent to the Committee on the District of Columbia by the District Commissioners, and after consideration in that committee, was reported by me to the Senate with instructions to ask its reference to the Committee on Appropriations. It went before that committee and was there considered, and put as an amendment on the pending bill.

The cause and necessity of that amendment will strike the mind at once when Senators understand the facts. Always here in this District we have had a law which authorized a jury of condemnation in condemning property for public use, as a set-off in determining the value of the property taken, to consider any benefits resulting to the remainder of the property owned by the particular person whose property was taken. That has always been the case here, as it is, I suppose, in every State of the Union.

In the sundry civil appropriation act of August 30, 1890, referring expressly to the condemnation of a square here, it required the taking by condemnation of the property at its fair and full value, without making any provision whatever as to benefits being received as set-off against the value.

When the act to extend North Capitol street was passed, the persons interested went into court before the condemnation, and two questions came before the court, whether or not these properties should have the value ascertained without regard to any benefit resulting to the remainder of the property not taken, or whether the assessment of damages should be under the usual condemnation laws of the District of Columbia.

The court held that by virtue of the third section of the sundry civil appropriation act, to which I have referred, the entire provisions of law touching the set-off of benefits against the value of the property taken were repealed by Congress, and instructed the commissioners that they should not allow any benefits resulting from the property by reason of the public improvement made.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask how came those commissioners, then, to charge $18,000 for benefits to the Annie E. Barbour property?

Mr. FAULKNER. Formally and officially I understand that they did not do it, but they expressed the opinion that if they had been allowed to set off the benefits against the value of the property taken in the case of Annie E. Barbour, those benefits would have amounted to $18,000; whereas they had to render a verdict for $21,000 as the value of the property taken, regardless of any benefits.

Mr. HAWLEY. But they made no such reference in the other case.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have not heard of any such reference as to the proceeding concerning the other property. Still these two cases stand upon the same basis. They are the only two exceptions in the entire process of condemnation for thirty or forty years in the District of Columbia, and the commissioners thought that fairness, equity, and justness to both parties required that if those orders were vacated and a new condemnation proceeding instituted both parties ought to stand upon the same basis and the same footing; and I think that view will appeal to the sense of fairness and justice of the Senator from Connecticut.

Of course, Mr. President, there is no constitutional difficulty in this matter. The Supreme Court, in two cases, have sustained exactly a similar order, one taken up from the State of Maryland, and the other from the State of New York, in which they held that there being no contract in the condemnation proceedings, in the first place, and, in the second place, no vested interest in either party until after payment of the damages ascertained by the jury of inquest, and no title vested until after that period, consequently there is no vested interest, and that even after confirmation, and in the case in 10th Howard as long after confirmation as seven years, the Legislature passed a law vacating the confirmation for reasons satisfactory to the Legislature, and ordering a new inquest. That question came before the court in Maryland, and subsequently to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the order was fully ratified and confirmed.

So it simply rests upon the question of the fairness and justice of this matter to the public in this District. If we do not amend this law and correct this evil, hundreds and hundreds, aye millions, of dollars will have to be paid out unjustly to landowners whose property is benefited by the taking and opening of streets for the public use, enhancing enormously their private holdings. Certainly we ought to apply the rule which has been given us in the experience of every State in the Union, it strikes me, and allow the benefits, if there are any, to be set off against the value of the property taken for public use.

Mr. HAWLEY. Of course there must be assessments for benefits, but my only point in this connection is that there are no benefits because the commissioners practically found upon this question no benefit. They found benefits in the case of the Barbour property and found none in this case.

Mr. FAULKNER. They did not find anything. They simply expressed an outside opinion. I do not know whether they expressed any opinion as to the Prospect Cemetery, but whether they did or not, we ought to put them both on the same footing, and not make flesh of one and fowl of another.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the committee have agreed upon this provision, I shall make no further controversy or argument about the matter. It would be impossible for me to secure a correction, and I do not know that there ought to be a change. It is a little aggravating, however, to have property taken away and an order approving it, and then receive an order vacating the previous order.

Mr. SHERMAN. My attention has been called to this matter by persons largely interested in the opening of North Capitol street, which is one of the finest avenues in the city, probably altogether the finest in this part of the city. There was a mistake made in making the provision for the opening of North Capitol street, which was adopted unanimously by both Houses. The mistake was in referring to a statute which did not apply to the particular circumstances. It referred to a statute where we purchased a whole square, and consequently there were no benefits to be assessed. Therefore it would not be just to apply that provision to this particular case.

I happen to know about this matter. North Capitol street extends through two pieces of ground. It is very finely improved, paved and graded, both north and south of these pieces of land, and it is necessary to introduce condemnation proceedings, because the corporation owning the cemetery ground has no right to transfer the property, nor has the Barbour estate, which is in litigation, any power. So, instead of referring to the general laws of the District of Columbia, which authorize benefits to be offset against damages, it referred to a law which had no application to the subject-matter. This is for the purpose of correcting it. I know it would be a great act of injustice for the District of Columbia to be called upon to pay forty or fifty thousand dollars for going through the cemetery and the Annie Barbour estate.

The Barbour estate, I understand, does not contend for it. Still it will avail itself of the privilege given by law to take a large sum of money, some $18,000, which would naturally be awarded in the nature of damages, and the Government would be bound to pay that sum unjustly.

In regard to the cemetery, I know, also, that the road occupies ground not employed for cemetery purposes. The cemetery directors as well as everyone else have known for some time that North Capitol street would at some period have to go through there, and there were no burials upon this land and the land west of it.

I have no doubt that a street 200 feet wide, running the whole length of the cemetery, would vastly benefit the cemetery property, and that any commissioners who would go there would say so. They have not done it because they could not assess benefits under the law. I know that the District Commissioners and the court itself are anxious that the matter should be corrected. All that will be done by the appraisers when they go there is to say whether or not on the whole the cemetery will not be benefited by the increased value of the land cut off on the west side. As a matter of course, the Commissioners will assess a fair amount for benefits conferred upon the value of the land.

The cemetery directors, I think, only desire to get as much as they can from the Government. That is very natural. But it seems to me that the provision now made is just and fair, to make the appraisment depend upon the value of the land first, and to deduct from that what they deem to be benefits conferred by the opening of the street through the land. It so happens that north and south of this land the land for all the streets has been given without cost, as a matter of common benefit to all the property. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAWLEY. So far as the Senator's argument is based upon the consideration that the order of the court may be arbitrarily vacated, so that the District may make a better bargain, I do not agree to it. But it is a fair proposition that there should always be a possibility of charging benefits as well as awarding damages. When, however, the Senator says that it is too much, and that he thinks we can get the land a little cheaper if we vacate the order of the court, I do not think that is a fair consideration at all.

And hereafter the management and control of the Freedmen's Hospital shall be under the board of incorporators of said institution.

So as to make the clause read:

For reading matter for patients, $25; in all, $53,025; and hereafter the management and control of the Freedmen's Hospital shall be under the board of incorporators of said institution.

Mr. GORMAN. At the request of the institution, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee. At the end of line 11, on page 49, I move to insert:

And hereafter the expenditures for the Freedmen's Hospital shall be under the supervision and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Board of Children's Guardians: For the Board of Children's Guardians, created under the act approved July 26, 1892, namely: For administrative expenses, including salary of agent not to exceed $1,000, expenses in placing and visiting children, and all office and sundry expenses, $3,500.

For care of feeble-minded children; care of children under 3 years of age, white and colored; board and care of all children over 3 years of age, and for the temporary care of children pending investigation or while being transferred from place to place, $9,650.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think there must be some mistake about this item. The other House allowed the Board of Children's Guardians $5,000 for administration, and I see here that the Senate committee propose to cut the amount down to $3,500. They have also made a change in the salary of the agent, who is a very competent man. It is to be reduced from $1,800, which I believe he is getting, to $1,000. This simply means that he continue as the agent of the board. I ask the Senator from Maryland if he will consent to put the whole sum back to $5,000, the amount fixed by the other House.

Mr. GORMAN. The committee examined into the expenditures of this organization very thoroughly, and with a view of doing justice and without impairing the efficiency of the board, we reported the amendment. We were under the impression that the amount is amply sufficient. There is this, however, to be said in reply to the Senator's criticism as to salary of the agent, that possibly the cut there is too severe. The matter of all the charities of the District will necessarily be gone over in conference, but I will agree to modify the first amendment and to make the salary of the agent $1,500, and the total amount $4,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not think that is right. It seems to me that the board is a very important part of our machinery for looking after the children of the District. It is a pity, after the board has been at work for nearly one year and has accomplished as much as it has, to go and destroy it without any regard for its usefulness. It seems to me it is all wrong.

I should prefer to have the committee allow the amount of $5,000, as it came from the other House, and also change the amount in line 13 to $5,000, allowing the board $20,000 in all. If the committee can make such changes I have nothing more to say; but if the committee is bound to destroy this most worthy organization, withholding the money absolutely necessary to the work laid upon it, then I would like to say something more about it, and some other Senators will have to say something.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is the Senator through?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; I am not through. I ask the chairman of the committee whether he will allow the amount to be raised to $5,000?

Mr. GORMAN. I stated to the Senate very frankly a moment since that this whole matter of appropriation for the charities of this District is the subject of a great deal of controversy. The Senate Committee on Appropriations has taken the proposition as it came from the other House and amended it all through, knowing perfectly well that the matter must be adjusted in the conference between the two Houses. A final adjustment can not take place now. I can not agree in regard to any one of these items, when that has been the rule all through, to permit the amounts to stand as they came from the other House. I say this to the Senator frankly. Therefore, I do not accept the amendment he now suggests.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I must insist that the amendment, in line 13, page 51, reducing the amount from $5,000 to $3,500, shall not be agreed to.

Mr. President, I should like to say a few words in regard to the work done by this board. The board, which was created by the act of July 26, 1892, was for the purpose of taking care of dependent children in the District of Columbia committed to its keeping by the courts. It works without any regard to church or sect, following out a similar law which is now in force in the State of Michigan, in Minnesota, and other States, where the one object is to get children out of institutions and put them into homes.

I do not object at all to have money voted for the aid of the different worthy institutions of the District of Columbia, but this board should not in my judgment be entirely destroyed, as is the evident purpose of this amendment. It is managed for the most part by men and women in the District of Columbia who give their time and attention to it without pay, and have taken a great deal of interest in finding homes for the children.

I will state that during the year 1894 the board has had committed to its care by courts of the District designated for such purpose by the act creating the board, 203 dependent, neglected, abused, or morally exposed children. These children have been cared for. Ninety have been placed in private homes where the expense of their maintenance has ceased; 49 are in institutions where board is being paid, and 36 are boarded now in private homes. The expenses of the board in doing this work for administrative purposes were $4,348.42; and for general purposes, including the care of feeble-minded children, boarda nd care of children both white and colored, both in institutions and private homes, clothing, medical attendance and all other expenses pertaining to the maintenance of children, $17,474.69. This is the first year. Of course they expect to take care of more children as the city and District grow, and therefore they should be allowed more money for the coming year.

The board is not hostile to the charitable institutions of the District. On the contrary it uses them to care for children until homes can be found. But the object of the board is to find such homes and place the children in them, instead of leaving these waifs to the continued influences of institutional life and to be turned adrift on the world. This is true charity, and it is common sense.

The board has paid over to the institutions of the District the following amounts for the temporary board and care of children who became its wards during the present year:

The Industrial Home School	$2,127.50
The National Colored Home	1,537.93
The Newsboys and Childrens' Aid Society	664.57
The St. Ann's Infant Asylum	115.69
The Association for Works of Mercy	117.61
The House of the Good Shepherd	66.54
The Home for Colored Foundlings	72.05

The board calls attention to the fact and represents to Congress that its work for the past year has caused ninety children who had been declared by competent authority to be in the condition of dependence and neglect demanding public relief to become self-supporting and absorbed into the best population of the District and surrounding States. Had those ninety children remained in institutions they would have called for an appropriation, over and above that now necessary, of $10,000. Deduct from this the whole amount of the board's appropriation for administrative expenses, $5,000, which was not all spent, and the board can fairly claim a net saving of $5,000 for the ensuing year.

The purpose of the board is to place children in homes and make them self-dependent. That is a great deal better than putting the children into institutions where they grow up and are cared for during many years and become a great expense to the District. It seems to me that instead of discouraging the people who are managing this board which Congress has created we ought to encourage them all we can, and what is the $2,000 that the committee proposes to save in a matter of a great and intelligent work of charity such as this board has just started upon?

I hope that we may be able to fix upon the amount given by the other House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the Senator in charge of the bill will not yield to the suggestions of the Senator from Michigan. If this matter is to be debated I want an opportunity to convince the Senate, as I think I can do by the record, that there never was as useless or as costly a luxury established within the limits of the District of Columbia nor a system as worthless as proved by its own work as this Board of Children's Guardians. In its very nature it is an anomaly; it is an incongruity.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suggest the lack of a quorum. I think if Senators are going into this question we had better have a Senate here so that we can understand it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want my friend to feel called upon to furnish an audience for me. I am entirely willing to talk to empty chairs for the two or three minutes I shall ask the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The lack of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Faulkner,	McLaurin,	Quay,
Allison,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Bate,	George,	Martin,	Roach,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Mills,	Shoup,
Brice,	Gorman,	Pasco,	Squire,
Call,	Hale,	Patton,	Stewart,
Carey,	Harris,	Peffer,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Vilas,
Coke,	Hunton,	Platt,	Walsh,
Davis,	Jarvis,	Power,	Washburn.
Dolph,	Jones, Ark.	Proctor,
Dubois,	Lindsay,	Pugh,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, as my friend from Michigan has managed to secure a quorum, I ask the attention of the Senate for only two or three minutes. I say that the creation of this Board of Children's Guardians constitutes an anomaly. The District of Columbia had but recently passed under the operation of a law which provided for the creation and appointment of a Superintendent of Charities; the gentleman selected for that purpose had barely entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office when Congress (I am sure without the attention of the Senate ever being called to it; I can not speak for the other House) incorporated in the appropriation act a provision creating a Board of Children's Guardians, which, if it did or ever attempted to do anything in the world, was to usurp the function of the Superintendent of Charities, who had scarcely started upon the work which had devolved upon him under the law.

For the last ten months that friction which was inevitable, which could not have been avoided and must of necessity have been foreseen if the attention of reflecting men had been called to the latter act, has been prevalent. If the Board of Children's Guardians is to be continued the office of superintendent of charities should be obolished. They have each other by the ears to-day, and have had since last fall.

The very words stricken out in this bill by the action of the Senate committee, beginning at line 22, page 51, and down to and including line 11, page 52, show conclusively the absolute impossibility of the two laws operating at the same time in the District of Columbia and the superintendent of charities discharging his duties with the Board of Children's Guardians infringing upon his prerogatives at every step.

I undertake to say (and I will submit the record evidence here to prove it) that there never was in this District or anywhere else upon this continent or on this earth a system of charities established that has proven as expensive per capita and as worthless in its character and results as this Board of Children's Guardians. It has cost five times as much under their supervision to support or care for a child as it cost under any other system of charities ever known in this District. Besides, they do not take care of the children.

The Senator from Michigan has just read from the report to show that the idea which the Board of Children's Guardians has of taking care of the unfortunate youths and girls of this city is to take them and put them out in private families in the different States all over the country. What chance there for education, pray tell me? What opportunity, what possibility of an opportunity is offered to a single one of the children taken by this Board of Children's Guardians and put out after an apprenticeship fashion to some farmer living in Pennsylvania, Mississippi, or Texas? Besides, it is a matter of empiricism yet; it has not been in existence long enough to be fairly condemned nor to be approved. We can only speak of the results which have attended its efforts up to this time.

I undertake to say that the Board of Children's Guardians has never had a child in its possession unless it was a child brought to it by a certain member and the same one member of the police force of this District. Every child that has ever come under its supervision or into its custody has been brought to it and turned over by one man, and he a private in the police force of this District.

This is no Board of Children's Guardians, nor any other sort of board. It is a corporation, if it may be so termed, consisting of one man. Its agent, I believe, is a man by the name of Lewis. He does what he pleases with the funds. He expends at his own pleasure, without restriction of law, the appropriations that you make. To denominate him a crank, in the face of the record which he has made, would be to treat him very mildly and very kindly.

The president of this board is a lady, a most accomplished and a most estimable lady, too. Her heart is wrapped up in charitable endeavor of every description. I say upon her authority, not filtered to me through another, but as given to me by herself—I speak from the message I received from her own lips when I say that the board has no practical power on earth over the appropriations made by Congress, but that this agent, this Mr. Lewis, is the only one who claims or exercises an atom of authority either over your appropriations or over the conduct of the business intrusted to this board.

I have authority from the same high and unquestionable source for the statement that its record so far is a failure; that it has not met the expectations of Congress, which made the appropriation, and that it has not proven itself a power potent for any good. I have her authority for saying further that she was ready and more than willing to come before the Appropriations Committees of both Houses and make the same statement.

I think the Committee on Appropriations has made one error, and I speak it deliberately in the face of the record. The error, in my judgment, that that committee has made is in not abolishing the Board of Children's Guardians altogether. There should not be one penny of an appropriation carried by this bill to the credit of that board. If it is to be done in the amount proposed by the committee or even in the larger amount as proposed by the Senator from Michigan let us at least be fair and make the appropriation of whatever money it is not subject to the control of the Board of Children's Guardians, but subject to the control and disbursement of Mr. Lewis, the agent, if anybody knows him well enough to furnish his initials.

As the Senator from Maryland in charge of the bill has said, the whole system of charities in this District by the report of the committee has been put in controversy, and every one of the charitable institutions of this city to which an appropriation has been made will be sent to conference.

Mr. President, I have given this matter no little consideration. I have endeavored to get to the bottom of it. I have waded through volumes of testimony in order to reach the truth. I know nothing of this board personally except its president, of whom I have spoken so frankly and so favorably. I know nothing of its agent, except as I know him through the record he has made.

I can not cherish a more profound conviction than the one I express when I insist that neither the pending bill nor any other bill should carry a penny of an appropriation to any such purpose as we are told this is to be devoted to. But if the other House has seen fit to make appropriations in excess, and largely in excess of any amount this agent, Mr. Lewis, has ever been able to expend—and Heaven knows the record shows he has not been stingy with it—if the House has seen fit to make appropriations largely in excess of his ability as proven in the past to waste and squander money, it seems to me that it is as little as the Senate can do to reduce those appropriations so as to send the matter to conference.

I undertake to say that there is not a charitable institution named in the bill that does not raise and furnish more than 75 per cent, leaving the appropriations of Congress every year less than 25 per cent of the amount actually expended by them in their charitable work. The proposition here is to strip every one of these voluntary charitable institutions and take away from them every penny of an appropriation when they are raising 75 per cent to the 25 per cent contributed by the Government, and let the Government undertake to furnish the whole 100 per cent for the maintenance and support of all the pauper children here, and leave it absolutely in the discretion of this agent, who seems to dominate without dispute what is known as the Board of Children's Guardians. I trust that the Senator in charge of the bill will decline to add one penny to a single appropriation recommended by the committee for this Board of Children's Guardians in any of its items.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in looking over the appropriations for charities in this bill the remarkable fact is developed that every appropriation for the care of children is increased by the Senate with the single exception of the appropriation for the Board of Children's Guardians, and that is very largely reduced. Every benevolent association connected with religious societies, it makes no difference what church it is, seems to have been looked after with a good deal of care, while this organization, which is independent of all the churches, which is being conducted, as I believe, by a class of men and women who do not deserve the excoriation the Senator from Kentucky has seen fit to bestow upon them, have their appropriation reduced from $5,000 to $3,500.

The Senator from Kentucky says that the money has been wasted by the Board of Children's Guardians; that the work they have done has been absolutely worthless. I do not know what estimate is put upon a child by the Senator from Kentucky, but my judgment is that if the Board of Children's Guardians have found five children living lives of vagrancy or of shame, and have put them in good homes where they are cared for and to a reasonable extent are educated, and are taught the elements of manhood and womanhood, it is idle to say that the few thousand dollars Congress has appropriated for this charity has been thrown away or has been worthlessly used.

Mr. McMILLAN. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that the board say they have found good, comfortable homes for over ninety of these dependent children.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Michigan. He is better informed on the subject than I am. I had intended to look the facts up carefully, but have not had time. So it appears that the record shows that the Board of Children's Guardians in the last year have taken ninety children who presumably have been living lives of vagrancy, perhaps lives of crime, and have given them homes. They found families willing to take them, I presume in some instances to adopt them, and to instruct them at least in the rudiments of what goes to make up manhood and womanhood in this world.

It is a remarkable thing, it strikes me, for a Senator of the United States in the face of that fact to stand here and say that the few thousand dollars that Congress has appropriated for this charity has been thrown away and has been uselessly disbursed. For my part this charity appeals very strongly to every sentiment of my heart. I believe it is in the right direction. I believe it is in better taste for Congress to appropriate money to a nonsectarian institution presided over by men and women who have the welfare of children at heart and who are interested not only to save them for a day or a month or for a year, but to put them under influences that very likely will mold them into good men and good women.

I do not complain that the Senate has increased the appropriations for these other institutions. My impression is that Congress is very stingy with all these appropriations, because it is a matter demonstrated over and over again that true economy so far as dealing with poor, destitute, and outcast children is concerned, is in the line of the utmost liberality. We should not measure our appropriations by technicalities. We ought to make these appropriations broad enough and large enough to enable these various institutions to give their time and their efforts to reclaiming these children from lives of degradation and of shame.

I do not know that I care to say a single word further. The Senator from Kentucky has quoted the lady who, I believe, is at the head of this institution as giving testimony to its discredit. I think I have met that same woman. I believe she has called upon me, and she made no such statement. On the contrary, she made an earnest appeal for a liberal appropriation for the Board of Children's Guardians.

If she has made the statement attributed to her by the Senator from Kentucky, I submit that she has no right to remain in the position which she occupies to-day, for a woman who is at the head of a great moral or educational or benevolent institution, who makes a statement that the funds are not properly used, and that the work of the organization is not being well conducted, ought to resign from the position, instead of making complaints such as have been attributed to her.

I do not know Mr. Lewis, the agent of the Board of Children's Guardians. I have been told that he is a very reputable man, a very benevolent man, and that he is a man having at heart the interests of the poor children of this District; and I am bound to believe that such is the fact. He may be a crank. Most men who do good in this world develop crankiness sooner or later in some direction. He may be a crank in this particular direction of looking after the poor destitute children of the District of Columbia—and the Lord knows there is a superabundance of them on every hand—trying to find for them well-managed and Christian homes, and putting them under well-managed and Christian influences.

I presume this appropriation is to be reduced by the Senate. I regret exceedingly that it is to be done, because I feel that this one institution, divorced from the church, nonsectarian in its work, ought to receive the approbation and the generous support of the Senate of the United States.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be adopted; but in expressing that hope, in view of the fact that the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Kentucky are so strongly opposed to it, the latter Senator apparently being in favor of utterly abolishing the Board of Children's Guardians, I confess that my hope is not very strong that the amendment will be adopted. I trust, however, that the distinguished Senator from Maryland, before he concludes to strike down this appropriation and to practically make it impossible for this organization of benevolent men and women to carry on their work successfully, will give it very careful consideration, and endeavor, if possible, to bring his mind to the conclusion reached by the Senator from Michigan, who has given very close attention to this matter and who is influenced, as I understand, by the great work which is being done in his own State by an organization similar to this.

This is all I care to say on the subject.

Mr. GORMAN: Mr. President, I do not care to continue the discussion of this matter further than to say to the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Michigan, that the Committee on Appropriations have no disposition to impair the work which is being done by the Board of Children's Guardians; but after the act of 1892 passed, creating this board, which was reported, I think, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, the appropriations for all these various charitable institutions were cut down 40 per cent; and the 40 per cent taken from them was practically put under the control of the Board of Children's Guardians.

It was reversing the whole system of charities in this District, and there naturally and necessarily came a very sharp conflict. We had reduced our appropriations to such institutions to a point where they could not live. It is proposed now to try to adjust the differences without impairing the efficiency of any of these boards or any of these institutions.

I will state frankly to the Senator from Michigan that, in view of the complications and in view of the fact that the matter can not possibly be settled in this body alone, we thought it was best to take these amendments, and when they go into conference to adjust the matter with a view to the best efficiency of these charities.

It was with no hostility that I approached the question. I am perfectly satisfied, because the figures show that fact, that the amount of money given to the Board of Guardians last year was too large. They could not expend it. It was taken from the other charities and deprived them of their ability to take care of hundreds of children. Some adjustment must be made, and the Committee on Appropriations have gone in the direction of making the adjustment here. As I stated, however, very frankly, it must be made finally when we come into the committee conference. Therefore, I trust the Senator from Michigan will accept the suggestion I make to him. It is in the line of what he desires.

The salary of the agent is cut down a little below that of other agents. We have cut it down to a thousand dollars. I will agree, and I will offer the amendment, if it is satisfactory to Senators on the other side, to make his salary $1,500 and to increase the total amount of the appropriation in that clause to $4,000. That will give us the opportunity to do what is absolutely necessary and what is right and just in the committee of conference.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I inquire of the Senator what he is willing to allow on page 51, lines 18 and 19, for the care of feeble-minded children, etc.?

Mr. GORMAN. During the past year I am certain from the estimates and the statements made that the whole expenditure of this board could not have exceeded from sixteen to seventeen thousand dollars. With a very much larger amount at their disposal they were not able to expend more, and they are not in any better condition to do it now. There is no objection to making the increase to $9,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suggest to make it $14,000, and then it can be arranged in conference.

Mr. GORMAN. That would make the total amount greater than the expenditures during the last year. If it is satisfactory to Senators on the other side, with a view to expediting the matter, I will move to add, in line 11, after the word "thousand," the words "five hundred;" so as to make the salary $1,500; to increase the appropriation to $4,000, in line 13; and to increase the appropriation, $9,650, in line 18, to $13,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I will accept that, so far as I am concerned, hoping that in conference we may get more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, on page 51, after the word "thousand," it is proposed to insert "five hundred;" in line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand;" and in line 18, after the word "place," to strike out "nine thousand six hundred and fifty" and insert "thirteen thousand;" so as to read:

Board of Children's Guardians: For the Board of Children's Guardians, created under the act approved July 26, 1892, namely: For administrative expenses, including salary of agent not to exceed $1,500, expenses in placing and visiting children, and all office and sundry expenses, $4,000.

For care of feeble-minded children; care of children under 3 years of age, white and colored; board and care of all children over 3 years of age, and for the temporary care of children pending investigation or while being transferred from place to place, $13,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply desire to say that it is extremely gratifying to me personally that the Senator from Maryland has made these changes in the bill, increasing the appropriations somewhat, and I trust that when they get into conference the Senate conferees may be disposed to yield a little further in the matter, and that all these charities may be taken care of very generously by the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. In line 20, on page 51, so as to make the total amount of the appropriation correct, I move to strike out "$13,150" and insert "$17,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 51, after line 21, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the institutions for children, including industrial and reformatory, namely, the Church Orphanage of St. John's Parish, the German Orphan Asylum, the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, including its care of colored foundlings, the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, the St. Joseph's Asylum, the House of the Good Shepherd, the Industrial Home School, and St. Rose's Industrial School, heretofore receiving aid by specific appropriation, are hereby remitted, except as herein specifically appropriated for, to the appropriation herein made and to the said act of July 26, 1892, "to provide for the care of dependent children in the District of Columbia and to create a Board of Children's Guardians," for all rights and benefits which they may have under the provisions of the said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of rifle practice and matches, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 6, to insert:

For expenses of camp of instruction, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 25, after the word "dollars," to insert "one civil engineer, one thousand five hundred dollars;" and on page 54, line 18, before the word "hundred," to strike out "thirty-six thousand eight," and insert "thirty-eight thousand three;" so as to make the clause read:

For distribution branch: For one superintendent, $1,600; one civil engineer, $1,500; one draftsman, $1,500; one foreman, $1,200; two clerks, at $1,000 each; one timekeeper, $900; one assistant foreman, $900; one tapper and machinist, $900; one assistant tapper, $600; three steam engineers, at $1,100 each; one blacksmith, $750; two plumbers, at $750 each; two assistant machinists, at $864 each; one property keeper, $600; three firemen, at $730 each; two flushers, at $540 each; one driver, at $480; two watchmen, at $480 each; one hostler, at $480; one calker, at $730; in all, $38,334.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. In lines 24 and 25, on page 54, I move to strike out the words "to be immediately available."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, line 24, after the word "ensuing," it is proposed to strike out "to be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

For extra clerical services in transcribing water-rent books to serve for the three fiscal years next ensuing, $875.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 55, line 12, after the word "cents," to insert "and such additional amount as may be necessary to pay said interest in full for the fiscal year 1895;" so as to make the clause read:

For interest on account of increasing the water supply, as provided in the act of July 15, 1882, $11,529.21, and such additional amount as may be necessary to pay said interest in full for the fiscal year 1895.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 18, after the word "cents," to insert:

And such additional amount as may be necessary to pay said interest in full for the fiscal year 1895: Provided, That not exceeding $300,000 of the surplus general revenues of the District of Columbia remaining on the 1st day of July, 1894, shall be transferred to the water fund to be be applied in payment of the principal of the debt incurred for increasing the water supply as provided in the act of July 15, 1882.

So as to make the clause read:

For sinking fund on account of increase of water supply, under act of July 15, 1882, $24,036.69 cents and such additional amount as may be necessary to pay said interest in full for the fiscal year 1895: Provided, That not exceeding $300,000 of the surplus general revenues of the District of Columbia remaining on the 1st day of July, 1894, shall be transferred to the water fund to be applied in payment of the principal of the debt incurred for increasing the water supply as provided in the act of July 15, 1882.

Mr. GORMAN. There is a clerical error in that amendment. In line 19, after the word "said," I move to strike out the word "interest," and insert "sinking fund."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. GORMAN. On page 12, in line 8, after the word "dollars," I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, in line 8, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

And a sufficient amount of this appropriation shall be applied to and expended for the immediate removal of the parking and trees and paving the space in the center of New York avenue between Ninth and Tenth streets.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. On page 16, after line 22, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 22, on page 16, it is proposed to insert:

For paving streets on north side of Lincoln Square, between Eleventh and Fourteenth streets, $8,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If in order now, I wish to move an amendment on page 11, after line 25. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after line 25, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That of the above-named sum, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the preparation of sketch plans and report by Frederick Law Olmstead on the extension of the streets and avenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. On page 28, after the word "dollars," in line 17, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 17, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That $5,000 of said sum shall be used for sprinkling driveways outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. In the appropriations for the water department, on page 54, line 4, there is a provision for "one timekeeper, $800." I move to strike out the word "eight" and insert "nine." I understand this amendment will not be antagonized by the Senator in charge of the bill. It is recommended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, line 4, before the word "hundred," it is proposed to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" so as to read:

One timekeeper, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. On page 54, line 18, I move to strike out "three," and insert "four," so as to make the total appropriation "$38,494," to conform to the amendment just made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to page 35. I have been informed personally by the parties interested that the wages allowed for drivers and other persons mentioned in the upper part of the paragraph on page 34 is entirely inadequate. For example, their wages run from $25 a month to $35 a month. I read in line 6 "one van driver, $360" a year, which amounts to just $30 a month, and continuing, "one ambulance driver, $480," which is $40 a month; "two assistant ambulance drivers, at $300 each," which is $25 a month; and "fourteen drivers of patrol wagons, at $360 each," which is $30 a month.

The amendment I wish to offer is in line 6, to strike out "$360," and insert "$480;" in line 8, to strike out "$300," and insert "$480;" in line 9, to strike out "$360," and insert "$480." I believe that is all except, if these amendments are agreed to, it will be necessary to change the total, in line 12, from $514,520 to $516,800. I appeal to the Senator from Maryland that this is a very reasonable request, and I do hope that he will accept the amendment without further urging.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 6, it is proposed to strike out "three hundred and sixty" and insert "four hundred and eighty;" in line 8, to strike out "three hundred" and insert "four hundred and eighty;" in line 9, to strike out "three hundred and sixty" and insert "four hundred and eighty;" and in line 12, to strike out "five hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and twenty," and insert "five hundred and sixteen thousand eight hundred;" so as to read:

One van driver, $480; one ambulance driver, $480; two assistant ambulance drivers, $480 each; fifteen drivers of patrol wagons, at $480 each, and three police matrons, at $600 each; in all, $526,800.

Mr. GORMAN. This amendment was suggested by the Committee on the District of Columbia. These men, of course, get very small compensation; they are inadequately paid; but so are many others provided for in the bill.

We must limit the total amount of these appropriations. The committee, while in full sympathy with the views which the Senator has presented, and which were also presented to us by the Committee on the District of Columbia, thought, in view of the limited appropriations which we were compelled to make at this session, we had better expend them in giving additional employment to others who have now no employment, and spend it upon the streets, so that there might be work for a great mass of people in improving the roads in the country around the city of Washington. I trust the Senator will not press the amendment at this time. Next year we can take up this subject. In the meantime we think we have gone beyond where we shall be permitted to go in providing generally employment all over this city to a very large number of people.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator will permit me, I do not believe that it is good policy to begin retrenchment and reform with this class of cases. I find that of the men who are working at the wages which I have read, here is one ambulance driver, and there are two assistant ambulance drivers, there are eight or ten patrol drivers, and a van driver. I am informed, and have no doubt that it is entirely true, that the drivers of ambulances are required to work twelve hours per day, including Sundays and holidays; that they are subject to call at all hours of the day and night, and are further required to take care of their teams at all times.

The patrol drivers are required to work from twelve to fourteen hours per day, and are also subject to call at all times. Many of them bring their meals with them and remain the full number of hours. They also take care of their teams, and work Sundays and holidays. The van driver works fifteen hours a day, and takes care of his team and works on Sundays and holidays.

The majority of these men have families to support, and on account of the small amount of wages paid them they barely manage to exist. They are required to remain away from their families a great part of the time. It is a fact, further, that these men, who are required to work longer and be on duty more hours and to be always subject to call, are the worst paid of any class of men in the District of Columbia.

I submit again to the Senator from Maryland and to his friends in charge of the bill that if they do not feel at liberty to accept this amendment now, they will at least feel the force of the suggestion and urge it upon the conference committee; but I think it would be eminently proper that the amendment be submitted now.

There is one further thought. These men are situated altogether differently from the ordinary laborer who, in the hours when his day's work is completed or before it begins in the morning, can do a chore here and there and make a dime or a quarter. These men are subject to call continually and continuously. They are required regularly to work twelve hours a day, and, in addition, when they are off duty they are subject to call at any time. Some of them work fourteen hours a day for $25 a month. I hope that the Senator from Maryland will think about $25 a month for a man and his family, and that he will put himself in the other man's place and then think—

A man's a man for a' that.

I ask that the amendment be adopted. I hope the Senator from Maryland will not object.

Mr CALL. Mr. President, I wish to state that it has been my purpose to introduce an amendment similar to the one offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER]. I regard it as a measure of great public policy that the people should be taken care of and that in our legislation due regard should be paid to their comfort and convenience. I think with the Senator from Kansas that it is an outrage which should not be permitted in the District of Columbia that men should slave out their lives for any corporation without some provison of law requiring that their work shall be limited to reasonable hours of labor. I go further than that. I believe that the law, where the legislative power exists to make it so, should require them to have such compensation as will enable them to live and not be starved, and that their families should be taken into consideration in that compensation.

What law of economy, what law of propriety exists that a great corporation shall be unlimited in its power over the lives, the comforts, and the happiness of the people?

I wish for myself to say that I believe the protection of private property and personal rights demands that there should be legislation in this direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I do not wish to call for a separate vote on concurring in the amendment on page 46, as to the Reform School, but I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to it and to express the hope that when the bill goes into conference the matter will be looked into further, with the hope, also, that the committee may not insist upon the amendment. The trustees of the Reform School of the District of Columbia are, I think, gentlemen of undoubted ability and have great interest in their work and they do not like to have any change made in their control. I do not wish to go into the question or to discuss it at this time. I have no desire to embarrass the passage of the bill, and I shall not. I simply ask of the Senator from Maryland that when the matter goes into conference it may be further considered.

Mr. GORMAN. I will state in reply to the Senator from Connecticut that we will as a matter of course do that. There are certain facts which have been brought to the attention of Senators and the committee during the day and since the bill was reported which require careful consideration. The committee do not desire to impair the control of the institution or to take it away entirely from the board, but what the committee sought to do and what is right is that over all these expenditures there should be some supervision, as there is in every other case. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut without the slightest hesitation that the most careful consideration will be given to these suggestions.

Mr. PLATT. That is all I ask.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to offer an amendment, notice of which I gave some time ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert after line 20, on page 33:

For providing instantaneous fire alarm apparatus for the public school buildings of the District, $2,500.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to say a single word on the amendment, and then I shall be content to have the Senate dispose of it as they see best.

The amendment was first referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It received the unanimous indorsement of that committee. Presumably the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia have quite as accurate knowledge regarding the wants of the District as any other equal number of Senators possibly can have. The amendment simply provides for a modern appliance, such as almost every public institution in every great city has at the present day, an instantaneous fire alarm, whereby the public property may be saved, if not the lives of the children better conserved.

It requires an appropriation of only $2,500 to provide this appliance for more than the one hundred school buildings in the District. I notice that the committee of the Senate have made an appropriation of $9,000 for fireproof stairways for three of the great school buildings in Washington. That is a very wise appropriation. In the same line a much greater degree of liberality of appropriation might be indulged in, and I feel sure it would receive the approbation of all who have the interest of children at heart. My amendment goes a little further than the committee have gone.

It looks to the preservation not only of the lives of the children, but of the school property. Inasmuch as we have found it wise to introduce those instantaneous fire alarms into other buildings in the city, and I think into almost all the public buildings, and inasmuch as the amendment received the approval of the Committee on the District of Columbia and, I understand, the Commissioners of the District, I think it ought to go into the bill, and I trust the Senator from Maryland will so conclude.

Mr. GORMAN. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire was very carefully considered by the Committee on Appropriations. I confess that I was personally impressed with it when it was first suggested, but upon examination we found that it would require a very much larger appropriation for proper connection with the wires and would cost some thousands of dollars. No provision has been made for that, and none is made in the amendment, and therefore the appropriation at this time would be useless. After careful consideration, in connection with the authorities of the District and those in charge of the schools, the committee concluded that the only practicable thing we can do at this time is to give them in three buildings fire-proof stairways and let the matter go over until the next session, when the whole scheme can be developed, and then we can consider it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to make a single inquiry of the Senator from Maryland. I had supposed from certain inquiries which I have made that the appropriation proposed in the amendment would be ample. Will the Senator from Maryland kindly state to me about what amount would probably be required for this purpose?

Mr. GORMAN. That is the difficulty. It could be only a rough estimate or a guess. Therefore provision could not be made for such appliances in the closing hours of the session, and necessarily the matter would have to go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the circumstances, receiving the assurance of the distinguished Senator from Maryland that the committee are thinking kindly of this proposition and will likely make the necessary provision next year, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to renew my amendment in the Senate, as I desire to test the sense of the Senate. I think it will perhaps be of some assistance to the conference committee to have the judgment of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 6, it is proposed to strike out "three hundred and sixty" and insert "four hundred and eighty;" in line 8, to strike out "three hundred" and insert "four hundred and eighty;" in line 9, to strike out "three hundred and sixty" and insert "four hundred and eighty," and in line 12, to strike out "five hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and twenty" and insert "five hundred and sixteen thousand eight hundred;" so as to read:

One van driver, $480; one ambulance driver, $480; two assistant ambulance drivers, at $480 each; fifteen drivers of patrol wagons, at $480 each, and three police matrons, at $600 each; in all, $516,800.

Mr. GORMAN. Inasmuch as I explained to the Senator from Kansas and the Senate the reason why the amendment can not be accepted, I am compelled to raise the point of order on the amendment. There is no estimate for it, and it proposes to increase the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks the Senator from Kansas whether the increase of appropriation is recommended by any standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. PEFFER. It is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. PEFFER. I offered the amendment as in Committee of the Whole, and no objection was made to it. I insist that I have a right to offer it in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas had a right to offer the amendment in the Senate, but the point of order having been made the Chair sustains it.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DEALING IN OPTIONS AND FUTURES.

Mr. WASHBURN. The so-called antioption bill came from the other House to the Senate two or three weeks ago and still remains on the table, for the reason that when I made the motion to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made some objection, as he desired to make some remarks upon it. I am sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts is not present, but it seems to me that the bill has lain on the table as long as it should. I understand my colleague on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], has given notice that he would request action on the motion. I should like to have the question of reference settled at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the bill (H. R. 7007) regulating the sale of certain agricultural products, defining "options" and "futures," and imposing taxes thereon and upon dealers therein, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6937) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and that course will be pursued.

Mr. CALL. Before the reading proceeds, I will state that the estimates for the Agricultural Department for the year 1895 are $2,233,843.06; the amount appropriated by the bill as it came to the Senate was $3,215,643.06; the reduction recommended by the committee is $7,460; the bill as reported to the Senate appropriates $3,208,133.06; the amount appropriated for the last fiscal year was $3,323,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 8, on page 2.

Mr. GEORGE. There are a great many amendments reported by the committee to the paragraph which is being read, relating to salaries and contingent expenses of the Executive office.

There are some amendments which I shall offer in case the lump sum, in line 2 on page 3, is not allowed to stand as it was when the bill came to us from the other House. I therefore suggest that the reading of the bill be continued down to line 4, page 3, without any vote upon any of the intermediate amendments, as the vote on the amendments will depend very largely upon the vote which will be taken on the amendment just preceding the close of the paragraph.

Mr. CALL. I understand the Senator's proposition to be that, after having read the paragraph, we shall pass over the proposed committee amendments until we get to the line the Senator has just referred to?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; until we get to line 4 on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under that agreement the Secretary will read the text of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, not reading the Senate committee amendments, and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations to this paragraph will be reserved until after action is taken upon the amendment in lines 2 and 3.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the bill, without having been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and it could not be so referred under the rules of the Senate, has been under consideration by that committee, and they have reached a conclusion with reference to the bill which I propose now to state to the Senate. After a very full and free examination of all the various amendments and after consultation with the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, we are satisfied that none of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to the paragraph under consideration ought to be adopted.

We think especially that the lump sum of $49,520 should be allowed to stand, and that all the amendments made by the committee, which undertake to supply officers who are to be paid for out of this lump sum, ought to be disagreed to. Up to within the last appropriation act, I believe, or before that, such a lump sum was allowed. The Committee on Appropriations, as I learn from the Senator from Maryland, disapproves the idea of making an appropriation so large as $49,520 in a lump sum. They have therefore reduced it to $20,000, and have undertaken to compensate for that reduction by increasing the number of clerks.

I call the attention of the Senate to some of the amendments which the Committee on Appropriations suggest in order to compensate for the lump sum which is reduced. They propose four clerks in one place for two clerks; seven clerks for four in another; seven clerks for four in another; six clerks for four in another. I desire to call attention especially to this point. In line 11 the Committee on Appropriations recommend three clerks of class 3, $4,800. That is not in the bill as it came from the other House. Then four clerks are provided instead of two; seven clerks instead of four, and six clerks instead of four. The contest seems to be whether the Committee on Appropriations is a better judge of the number of employés and the amount to be paid to a very considerable number of them than the Secretary of Agriculture.

I wish to read to the Senate a memorandum which I have here from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture:

> In order to enable the Department to secure a larger number of clerks at lower salaries, and to enable the Secretary to adapt the compensation to the work actually done, the House bill provides a lump sum for clerks, messengers, mechanics, watchmen, firemen, and charwomen of $49,520. It is desirable to have the appropriation in this form. The Senate committee have, however, restored the statutory roll as in last year's appropriation bill. If this stands a few additional clerks must be provided.

It is pretty well known that the present Secretary of Agriculture has exhibited some considerable economy in the management of his office. I do not see the reason why the lump sum of $49,520, which the other House allowed, should be taken away from him and $20,000 in a lump sum allowed, and why at the same time Congress should undertake to specify to him an additional number of clerks at a specified salary, when, as he claims, and as the Department claims, if he is allowed a lump sum, they can regulate the compensation of each of the clerks, graduated according to his work, and in that way operate a very considerable economy.

I well know that it is very difficult to resist any proposition made by the Committee on Appropriations, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate, if they will give any attention at all to this matter, to the fact that the House Committee on Agriculture has framed the bill in this respect as we desire, and that the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry desire to have the bill passed as it passed the other House.

So in order to test this question and settled it I ask for the vote to be taken on the amendment in lines 2 and 3, whereby forty-nine thousand five hundred and twenty was stricken out by the committee and $20,000 inserted. Let the Senate understand now that if this amendment is rejected all the increase in clerks, amounting to a very considerable sum, made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations will be disagreed to. So in fact there will be little difference in the appropriations, as the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the other House think they ought to be.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit me, I should like to inquire whether he represents the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in this matter.

Mr. GEORGE. I do. I represent the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate who considered the whole subject and directed me to make this statement to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee, or of the Senator who has this bill in charge. For any of the other Departments of the Government is a lump sum of $50,000, or any other lump sum appropriated to be spent by the head of the Department in the employment of clerks, messengers, etc., or is this item singular in that respect?

Mr. CALL. I understand that the rule which has governed the Senate in these appropriations is to make specific appropriations and to diminish the authority of the Secretary as largely as possible by providing for each specific item of appropriation. Except in the case of a contingent fund for some special purpose I think the answer to the Senator from Connecticut is that there is not for any of the Departments a lump provided to pay the clerks and other persons employed in the Department.

Mr. PLATT. Then I may be permitted to say that I fear we shall be making a very bad departure here from our usual practice, and one which in a few years would be extended into all the other Departments, and we shall have pretty much all the clerks and lesser employés paid by a lump sum under the direction of the Secretary of the particular Department. I should think we ought to hesitate about doing that.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is exactly the question that is raised by the Senator from Mississippi. It is whether we shall give to the Secretary of Agriculture a gross sum of money to employ clerical force at whatever rate he selects and whomsoever he may select to perform the service, regardless of any examination or anything of the kind.

Mr. DOLPH. It takes them out from under the civil-service rules.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; it takes them out from under the civil-service law and it gives him the right to employ whomsoever he chooses at whatever compensation he chooses. It takes out of the bill those that have been appropriated for specifically by different classes for years. It has been a universal rule of the Senate, immemorial so far as I know, that for all the classified service we shall appropriate specifically so much for so many clerks of class 4, so much for so many clerks of class 3, for so many clerks of class 2 and class 1, and for so many at $1,000 and $900. That has been the universal rule. No other Department is given this authority.

Mr. DOLPH. Is any other Department allowed even $20 000 in a lump sum to be expended for this purpose?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not for clerical force, unless it be purely for a temporary purpose to bring up an accumulation of work and transact it so that it can be done in the calendar year.

Mr. DOLPH. So this appropriation of $20,000 is an exception so far as the other Departments are concerned.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, the $20,000 is for minor places that do not come under the civil-service law, like messengers, charwomen, etc., and there may be more of them at one time of the year than another. The Committee on Appropriations in striking out this lump sum and inserting the number of clerks and the different classes which may be required have followed the universal rule which has been adopted in the Senate for years and years.

We submitted to the Secretary, or the Assistant Secretary, a request for a statement of the very lowest number of clerks he could get along with and their classes, or salaries, and we amended the bill to correspond with that statement. After reporting the bill, the Secretary making the suggestion, we made some changes. On page 2, in line 13, the word "seven," which the committee had allowed, was stricken out and "ten" was inserted, so as to read "ten clerks of class 1," that is, at $1,200. Then in line 15 we struck out the words "four clerks, at $1,000 each," and inserted "ten." We gave to the Secretary precisely what he said would be necessary under the classifications and the universal rule of the Senate.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was for many years chairman of the committee; the Senator in the chair [Mr. HALE in the chair] has long been a member of that committee; and they will bear testimony that it has been a universal rule, and it has always been sustained in the Senate, to make specific appropriations wherever they could be made. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi will not prevail.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not offering any amendment. In behalf of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, I am merely resisting an improper amendment which I think has been offered by the Committee on Appropriations. That is the way the thing stands. I am offering no amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Mississippi to ask that the question be first taken upon the committee's amendment at the top of page 3, proposing to appropriate an aggregate sum.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, the lump sum. That will dispose really of the other amendments.

It is well for me to make the remark here (and it is a very obvious one as soon as suggested, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate especially), that the Department of Agriculture is not a department to carry on the Government of the United States. It is no part of the machinery provided in the Constitution for carrying on the Government of the United States. It is something which Congress provides for simply to aid agriculture.

There is no law which can regulate all the duties of the Department of Agriculture. It is a scheme or a Department inaugurated by the Government for the purpose of making certain investigations, all of a scientific character; the purchase of seeds and the distribution of seeds among the farmers of the country; getting certain information through the statistician in which the farmers of the country and the people of the country generally are interested, and distributing that information. It exercises no constitutional functions. It is neither a part of the Navy, nor of the Army, nor of any civil department of the Government.

It has nothing to do with those functions. The management of this Department assimilates very much to the management of a farm, and must depend very largely upon the discretion and good sense of the head of the Department. Especially do I want the Senate to understand that these clerks and employés are not simply like the clerks and employés of other Departments of the Government. They are assigned to duties, very largely by the Secretary of Agriculture himself. He selects a man who is best adapted to perform that particular duty, not connected with the Government of the United States.

Some of the duties are very important, requiring men of skill, and some of them are very insignificant. He manages or ought to manage the Department very much like a farmer would manage his farm. He gives to each man the compensation which is suitable for his labor, and that is the way it ought to be done, especially in the subordinate offices.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate again to what the Department say. The Department claim that if this lump sum is granted they can better adjust the compensation to the merits of its employé. I see no reason why every clerk should be paid the same compensation when they perform diversified duties some requiring great skill, some requiring ordinary skill, some requiring very little skill. I want to call the attention of the Senate to another point. It is well known that the present head of that Department has exercised discretion so far as it is vested in him in reducing expenditures.

The Department come and tell you now that if the Senate amendments are adopted as against the protests of the Department, as against the voice of the Agricultural Committee of the other House, as against the judgment of the other House, as against the judgment of the Agricultural Committee of the Senate, it will increase the expenditures of the Department.

I do not see any reason why we should be governed by a cast-iron rule on that subject, nor do I see any reason, allow me to say, with the greatest deference to the gentlemen who compose the Committee on Appropriations, why their judgment in these matters should prevail over the judgment of the committee specially selected in the House of Representatives to discharge this duty, and over the judgment of the House of Representatives themselves, and over the judgment of that committee of the Senate which also is specially selected for the purpose of determining as far as may be how that Department should be carried on.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate will agree to the judgment of the House of Representatives; that it will agree to the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives; that it will agree to the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, and disagree to the amendments proposed by the general Appropriation Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the committee, in lines 2, 3, and 4 on page 3, the Chair understands.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words before the vote is taken.

I do not understand that the new departure proposed in the bill as respects the clerical force in the Departments is one that will materially advance the interests of the Department. This is the only time I know of in my experience in this body where it has been proposed to allow a lump sum. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that this is the first time a lump sum has ever been proposed to a Secretary for the purposes of clerk hire.

As a matter of course the Senate and the House defer to the judgment of a head of a Department respecting his clerical force, but we have always insisted (and I know of no exception to that rule since I have been in the Senate) that the head of a Department shall give us a list of his clerical force. If he wants two clerks of class 4 rather than four clerks of class 4 and then wants to increase the clerks of a lower grade, those changes have always been made for the convenience of the Department.

But it seems to me it will create great confusion if we go beyond that and provide that a Secretary, whether it be of the Treasury, or of Agriculture, or of the Interior, shall have $50,000 or $100,000 to dispose of as he may choose, employing a clerk today, another to-morrow, and another the next day, and thus bring the clerical force in the Departments into confusion.

If this be true in regard to the Secretary of Agriculture, it will be true in regard to the Secretary of the Treasury and every other Department in the Government. If the Senator from Mississippi will note the bill passed early this morning, known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, he will observe that it is nothing but a salary bill, covering practically clerk hire in all the Departments, and covering clerk hire in all the great offices of the country, the subtreasury and the public offices in New York City, Chicago, St. Louis, and New Orleans. We require the heads of Departments to make an estimate of the clerical force they need, the number, and the compensation, and when that is done, then as nearly as we can we appropriate for them.

As the chairman of the committee has truly said, the Committee on Appropriations or our chairman stated to the Secretary of Agriculture, or rather to the Assistant Secretary, that we did not think it wise to depart from the long established custom of having clerks provided for specifically, and asked him to make a revision of the necessary clerical force in the Department, and that we could recommend an appropriation for that force.

I understand that was done and the committee proposed to make that provision in the bill. When we have appropriated for all the clerical force desired by the Secretary of Agriculture and practically in such way as will enable him to conduct the clerical business of the Department, why should it be insisted now that a lump sum shall be thrown into his lap to be disposed of as he may choose for that purpose?

It seems to me that it opens a door which will grow wider and wider until the several heads of Departments will want all the money they can get appropriated in a general sum, in order that they may distribute it according to their will and not according to the supervision of Congress.

That is all there is in this question. It is not a question of committees or preference of committees. Every Senator understands this subject, I suppose one Senator as well as another. It was because we did not wish to make this great departure from the uniform practice of the Government that the Committee on Appropriations has proposed to make these appropriations specific.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course I know I am rowing upstream when I am rowing against the Committee on Appropriations, but still I am right, and I propose to take such time as is necessary to demonstrate the correctness of my position to the Senate. If the appropriation of a lump sum is wrong in principle I should like to know why the sum of $20,000 in a lump is allowed by this amendment? If you must specify everything that is to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture, why give him the $20,000? The committee allow $20,000 instead of $49,000, and the great wrong now done to the principle which they think is so clear, is that $29,000 is added to the lump sum which the Committee on Appropriations themselves think ought to be allowed, and which would result in a large saving to the Government.

The Senator from Iowa totally failed to notice the very important consideration which I presented to the Senate, showing the distinction between the work done by the employés of this Department and the employés of other Departments of the Government. Ordinarily a clerk in one of the Departments has to do two things, and that is about all he has to do. He ought to write a good hand, and he ought probably to have some little knowledge of the four principal parts of arithmetic, addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, and that is about all.

But an employé of the Agricultural Department is frequently called upon to decide something or to do something which depends upon his good judgment as to how he shall do it. He is called upon to make some investigation in reference to the growing of crops, or in reference to the diseases of cattle, and so on, all of which is outside of any duty of that kind that is ever devolved upon any ordinary clerk of the Government. So with the multifarious duties which must be assigned by the Secretary himself to each one of these employés there ought to be allowed to him the discretion of paying to each one the value of his services at least out of $3,000,000 of appropriation to the extent of the small sum of $49,000, when the committee itself has said that he ought to have $20,000.

I see the Senator from Iowa present, and I should like to have him explain why it is such a crime, such a violation of principle, such a dangerous precedent to allow subordinate clerks to be employed by the Secretary of Agriculture at a rate of compensation to be fixed by him, and at the same time it is perfectly right to employ messengers at a rate of compensation to be fixed by him, laborers at a rate of compensation to be fixed by him, mechanics at a rate of compensation to be fixed by him, and charwomen at a rate of compensation to be fixed by him.

Why is it that all these employments are perfectly regular and right, but when you come to a man who is called a clerk then you must have a specific sum mentioned in the statute or else the Constitution is violated and the country is ruined?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. Just one word more and I will be done.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to answer the Senator right now, if he will allow me.

Mr. GEORGE. All right; you may do it.

Mr. ALLISON. As to laborers, mechanics, and charwomen, the Secretary can select the number, but he can not select the compensation. There is a law which provides that the messengers in the Departments shall receive so much, that all laborers shall receive so much, that all mechanics employed shall receive so much, and that all charwomen shall receive so much. Their compensation is defined in the statute, so that the only thing the Secretary can do under the clause to which the Senator is now alluding is to fix the number of messengers, of laborers, of mechanics, and of charwomen. He can employ five or four of either or all, or he can employ two at one time and three or five at another. He may need more mechanics at a particular time than another, and so of the others. But he can not under this provision fix the compensation of any one of them.

Mr. GEORGE. What difference does that make?

Mr. ALLISON. It makes a great difference.

Mr. GEORGE. The people of the United States are certainly interested only in the amount of money that goes out of the Treasury and not as to whether John Smith, or William Jones, or some other man shall receive $1,000 and another $900. We ought to go upon the idea that a man who is at the head of a Department like this knows something about his business. His name came before us. He could not take his place without our consent. He is nominated by the President and must be confirmed by our advice and consent before he can take his place. If we think the person so nominated is incompetent to regulate this matter between his clerks, we ought to reject him.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to a point which I regard as a very important one, and which he failed to make any reference to. The duties of these persons are not of the character defined by law, but they are largely of the kind defined by the discretion of the Secretary. He can select and impose important duties upon one and less important duties upon another. If that be the case, the salary of the more important employé ought to be larger, and the salary of the less important employé ought to be less.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Mississippi puts particular emphasis upon the importance of the work of the Department of Agriculture. He says a great portion of it must depend upon the intelligence and fitness of the employé. He referred incidentally to the examinations that are made. A great deal must depend upon the discretion of the Secretary, not in the employment of a mere clerk to do a little writing; that is wholly immaterial. It is clerical work we have provided for; but the Senator says that the important work depends upon the character and fitness of the employé, and the Secretary must have discretion in the selection of his force.

I suppose the Senator approves of the organization of the Department of Agriculture as found in the remainder of the bill as it came from the other House. Let us look at that a minute. We find here the division of botany. Ought not a good botanist be selected for that postion, one selected by the Secretary because of his fitness for the position, and ought he not to be allowed, under the idea of the Senator from Mississippi, to fix the salary of that botanist? Yet here is a provision of the House bill, and there is no disagreement about it, which fixes the salary of the botanist and curator of the herbarium at $2,500; one assistant botanist, $1,600; one assistant botanist, $1,400; and so it goes through.

Then we have a division of entomology; one entomologist, at $2,500, and assistants. Then we have a division of economic ornithology and mammalogy. We provide for one ornithologist, who shall be chief of division, at $2,500, and then for various assistants. So with the division of pomology; so with the division of microscopy, the division of vegetable pathology, the division of chemistry, the division of forestry, the division of seeds; and in every one of these divisions we fix the salaries of the assistants in the Department, and the Secretary does not ask to have authority to name the amount that is to be paid to them.

But when it comes down to the employment of twenty or thirty clerks to do some clerical work, then it is insisted that every rule of the Senate must be departed from, and that the Secretary must be given authority to exercise his own discretion in the selection of clerks and the amount to be paid them.

I hope the amendment of the committee will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). Without objection, the question will be taken on the amendment on page 3, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, on page 3, it is proposed to strike out "$49,520" and insert "$20,000;" and in line 3, after the word "all," to strike out "$96,980" and insert "$87,540."

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this bill is in my charge, and perhaps it is proper that I should have something to say upon the pending question. The committee's view of the case has been presented by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. COCKRELL] and by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. It is proper that I should present to the Senate both sides of this question.

The Secretary of Agriculture gives as a reason for this proposition in the bill as it came from the House, which the Committee on Appropriations by a majority of that committee have amended by classifying the additional assistance he requires, that the classification under which these clerks have been appointed is not adapted to the character of work required of them, that in some places a clerk receiving a salary of $1,800 is performing the duty properly belonging to a seven hundred and fifty dollar clerk or a nine-hundred-dollar clerk, and that if the Secretary has the discretion conferred upon him by this lump appropriation, to that extent he can arrange that the clerk receiving $900, performing the work of an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk, can be assigned to a corresponding position, and the eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk reduced to the character of work and the degree of compensation which he should properly receive.

The question is whether the Senate or the Committee on Appropriations can with absolute accuracy determine the particular character of the work in a classification and affix to it the compensation, leaving no discretion whatever to the Secretary of Agriculture, whether a cast-iron rule shall be provided, down to each pin or the number of pins to be used, and be provided by Congress, or whether a general limitation and direction, leaving a considerable discretion to the officer at the head of the Department, shall be given to him.

I may speak personally for myself as a member of the committee, that always in regard to all Departments, I believe, that if a Cabinet officer is worthy of his position—and we must act upon the hypothesis that, as we confirmed him, he is honest and capable, and adapted to the position and the work—he should be trusted to some extent, and that a margin of discretion should be allowed to him.

But the committee entertained—and that has been the rule in the Senate, with which I do not agree—the idea, until the Civil Service Commission was established, that Congress should ascertain how many pins each member of the Cabinet was required to use in his Department; and the question is as to the extent of that discretion, whether any should be allowed to him in the disbursement of the public money, and, if so, how much. Since the Civil Service Commission has been established the Cabinet officer is deprived of all authority in that respect, and that power is relegated to three officers distinct from all other branches of the Government, so that he is not permitted to have any discretion in regard to the selection, the aptitude, or the capacity of particular men for particular work.

As to this provision the Secretary of Agriculture desired—and the House have sustained him in it—that to the extent of $49,000 he should be allowed this latitude of judgment and this use of his own idea of the capacity of men in their selection, and that this money might be used by him for that purpose. The committee, however, have adhered to the rule of a specific appropriation for each specific item, leaving no discretion whatever to the Secretary of Agriculture, except as to the $20,000 referred to.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, if in the Agricultural Department a clerk receiving a compensation of $1,800 a year is doing the work of a nine-hundred-dollar clerk, and the nine-hundred-dollar clerk is doing the work of an eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk, it shows that the Secretary of Agriculture is not the man for the place, because while Congress provides the clerks and provides their compensation, I suppose it is the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to settle the particular business for which their competency and their salary fit them, and their salary pays them.

If this proposition would be a good thing for the Secretary of Agriculture, it would be a good thing for the heads of all the Departments, and if we are to adopt this principle, if the argument is good, I think this Government might save a very large amount of money by letting out to the lowest bidder the conduct of every Department, allowing some man to bid a lump sum to transact the business, and then to employ the necessary employés on the best terms he could get them, to exact the most labor possible from them, and to determine the number of hours they should serve. No doubt, with proper supervision, the public business might be transacted, and there would be a saving of one-half of the appropriation we make annually for the conduct of the public business.

Mr. CALL. I should like the Senator from Oregon to trace the connection he would make between letting out the Department work under contract to the lowest bidder and giving to the Secretary of Agriculture discretion in the use of $49,000 out of $3,000,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask him what he means by the expression in respect to $49,000?

Mr. CALL. I mean to say that the Secretary of Agriculture asks to be allowed to use $19,000 as his own judgment may dictate in the selection and compensation of certain employés, clerks, and others provided for in this bill, and that $20,000 of that amount is allowed him, and the other $29,000 is taken away.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Florida will allow me to say also that there can be no reason, in my opinion, why any such discretion should be given to that Secretary which is not given to every other Secretary.

I think one of the wisest things that could be done would be to allow the heads of Departments to select their subordinates. The wisest thing that can be done, in my opinion, is to abolish what is called civil-service reform and the Civil Service Commission. There can be found no reason, in my opinion, why that particular Secretary should be given privileges which do not extend to every other Secretary of every other Department.

Mr. CALL. I do not know but that I agree with the Senator from Tennessee entirely, but I do not think his argument furnishes any reason why this particular Secretary should not be allowed this sum of money.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, as long as it is denied to others, I shall be in favor of denying it to him. I propose to deal with the heads of all Departments alike and fairly.

Mr. CALL. That is a matter of justice; but we are now looking into the question of what is the particular advantage of this particular Department in respect to this bill. I think the Senator is right, that a reasonable discretion should be given to all Departments in respect to their employment of clerks, and that the functions of the Civil Service Commission, if continued, should be limited, so that they would not confine, circumscribe, and destroy the power of administration conferred upon the heads of Departments.

But that is the proposition which is contained in this bill, that according to present classification and appointment of clerks, although the Secretary of Agriculture may dismiss an $1,800 clerk, he can not select a $900 clerk and put him in the position of receiving compensation for the work which he is actually performing. He reports now as to his Department and its administration that there are appointments to the extent of $49,000 which a reasonable discretion conferred upon him would enable him so to classify and so to adjust that he could put in the higher paid places men of adequate ability to perform the work and reduce those not having it to lower ones. That is the proposition which he makes, and which I desire the Senate to stand by.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now state the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations on page 2, commencing with line 9.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, after the word "telephone," it is proposed to strike out "clerk," and insert "operator;" in line 11, after the word "dollars," to insert "three clerks of class 3, $4,800;" in line 12, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "four;" in the same line, after the words "class 2," to strike out "two thousand eight," and insert "five thousand six," and in line 13, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

One telegraph and telephone operator, $1,200; two clerks of class 4, $3,600; three clerks of class 3, $4,800; four clerks of class 2, $5,600; seven clerks of class 1—

Mr. GEORGE. That should be ten.

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the amendment in line 13 by striking out "four" and inserting "ten."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, before the word "clerks," it is proposed to strike out "four" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Ten clerks of class 1.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the same clause, on page 2, line 14, after the words "class one," it is proposed to strike out "four thousand eight" and insert "eight thousand four."

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "eight thousand four" and inserting "twelve thousand;" so as to read:

Ten clerks of class 1, $12,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the same clause, line 15, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "seven;" in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "seven;" in line 16, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "six;" and in line 17, after the word "each," to strike out "three thousand three hundred and sixty" and insert "five thousand and forty;" so as to read:

Seven clerks, at $1,000 each, $7,000; six clerks, at $840 each, $5,040.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 20, to insert:

One assistant fireman, $720; one assistant fireman, $600; two night watchmen, and two night watchmen who shall also be watchmen for the seed buildings, at $720 each, $2,880.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 25, before the word "messenger," to strike out "clerks;" and on page 3, line 1, after the word "mechanics," to strike out "watchmen, firemen;" so as to read:

Messengers, laborers, mechanics, and charwomen.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. The total sum named in line 4, on page 3, at the end of the clause which has been amended, is a smaller aggregate than the increases will make it.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 4, on page 3, $87,540 should be stricken out and the total corrected according to the changes which have just been made.

Mr. CALL. In place of "$87,540," in line 4, on page 3, I move to insert "$91,140."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 8, after the word "dollars," to strike out "two clerks of class 3, $3,200," and insert "one clerk of class 3, $1,600."

Mr. CALL. In line 8, on page 3, before the word "clerks," I move to strike out "two" and insert "three."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Florida proposes to amend the committee amendment.

Mr. CALL. I desire to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "two" in line 8, and inserting the word "three;" so as to read "three clerks of class 3."

Mr. COCKRELL. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out "two clerks of class 3, $3,200," the Senator from Florida proposes to strike out "two" and insert "three," and have the remainder of the language which the committee proposes to strike out stand so as to read——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to abandon the committee amendment in line 8, on page 3, and insert "three clerks of class 3, $4,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment of the committee proposing to insert "one clerk of class 3, $1,600," is withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment in line 9 will be considered as withdrawn.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 12, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one clerk at $1,000."

Mr. CALL. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The committee propose to withdraw that amendment, and let the bill stand in that respect as it came from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 13, after the word "all," to strike out "fifteen thousand seven" and insert "thirteen thousand one."

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "thirteen thousand one" and inserting "seventeen thousand three hundred."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 16, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred;" so as to read:

Division of statistics: One statistician, $3,000.

Mr. GEORGE. I am requested by the Agricultural Department and by the Committee on Agriculture to ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment, and to let the bill stand as it came from the House of Representatives. This office of statistician is said to be a very important one, and it is claimed that $3,500 is only a fair compensation for the services.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how much the salary of that officer is at present?

Mr. CALL. His salary is $2,500. The committee proposes to increase it to $3,000.

Mr. DOLPH. The salary at present is $2,500, and that has been the salary for years past?

Mr. CALL. It has been.

Mr. DOLPH. The House has increased it $1,000—from $2,500 to $3,500—and the Senate committee proposes to reduce it $500, leaving an increase of $500 beyond what it has been heretofore.

Mr. CALL. The House increased it to $3,500 and the Senate committee struck off $500, leaving it $3,000.

Mr. DOLPH. An increase of $500 over the present salary?

Mr. CALL. An increase of that sum over the present salary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, in line 24, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twenty-eight thousand two," and insert "twenty-seven thousand seven;" so as to make the total "$27,760."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. On page 3, line 17, I move to strike out "two clerks of class 4, $3,600," and insert "one clerk of class 4, $1,800."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, it is proposed to strike out the words "two clerks" and insert "one clerk;" and in the same line to strike out "$3,600" and insert "$1,800;" so as to read:

One clerk of class 4, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 18, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "four;" and in the same line, after the word "three," to strike out "$3,200" and insert "$6,400;" so as to read:

Four clerks of class 3, $6,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 19, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "four;" and in the same line to strike out "$2,800" and insert "$5,600;" so as to read:

Four clerks of class 2, $5,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 20, before the word "clerks," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" and in the same line, after the word "one," to strike out "$4,800" and insert "$6,000;" so as to read:

Five clerks of class 1, $6,000.

Mr. CALL. In line 21, before the word "clerks," I move to strike out "five" and insert "seven."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 21, before the word "clerks," it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" and in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "seven thousand;" so as to read:

Seven clerks at $1,000 each, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I move to amend, in line 24, by changing the total amount proposed for the division of statistics from "$27,760," to "$35,160."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have it understood that if these additions be incorrect, they may be corrected by the clerks.

Mr. CALL. That is always the case.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all I care for.

Mr. COCKRELL. The footings will be changed by the clerks where it is necessary to correspond with amendments made by the Senate.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 17, before the word "chief," to insert "ornithologist, who shall be;" so as to read:

One ornithologist, who shall be chief of division, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred;" so as to read:

Division of Vegetable Pathology: One pathologist, $2,000.

Mr. GEORGE. All the other chiefs of division receive a salary of $2,500 except this one and the one in the Division of Forestry. It seems the Committee on Appropriations have seen proper to put them on a different footing from the other chiefs of divisions. I am requested by the Agricultural Department to say that these chiefs are just as valuable and just as meritorious, and in fact are entitled to as much salary, as the others. I have heard no reason why these men should be put down at $2,000, while the others all have $2,500. I hope the committee will be able to explain that.

Mr. COCKRELL. The reason of it is that they were not estimated for. The head of the Department himself did not estimate for these increases.

Mr. GEORGE. They are reductions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg the Senator's pardon. The House increased the appropriation above the estimate, and we put it back at the sum estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GEORGE. I am requested by the Agricultural Department to say that there is no reason why these men should not have the same compensation as the other chiefs of divisions in the Department; and that is the opinion also of the Committee on Agriculture, and I will say that unless there is some reason given why these men, the chief of the Division of Vegetable Pathology, and the chief of the Division of Forestry, are supposed to be of less value than the other chiefs of divisions, they ought to have the same compensation as the others.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are chiefs of divisions in other Departments receiving only $2,000 per annum, and the Secretary of Agriculture, when he made out his estimate of what he wanted and the way he wanted the money distributed in his office, estimated these two chiefs of division at $2,000 each, and we left them precisely as he said he wanted them.

Mr. ALLISON. And that is the present salary?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the present law, and has been for years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 5, in line 13, before the word, "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "four;" and in line 16, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six thousand three," and insert "five thousand six," so as to read:

One assistant pathologist, $1,400; one assistant pathologist, $1,200; one clerk, at $1,000; in all, $5,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred;" and on page 6, line 5, before the word "hundred," to strike out "eight thousand three" and insert "seven thousand eight;" so as to make the clause read:

Division of Forestry: Chief of division, $2,000; one assistant chief of division, $1,600; one clerk, class 2, $1,400; one clerk, class 1, $1,200; one clerk, at $900; one clerk, at $720; in all, $7,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 8, before the word "hundred," to strike out "eight" and insert "six;" in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one clerk, class 3, one thousand six hundred dollars;" in line 10, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one clerk, class 1, one thousand two hundred dollars," and insert "two clerks, class 1, two thousand four hundred dollars;" and in line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "eight thousand five," and insert "seven thousand nine;" so as to make the clause read:

Division of Records and Editing: Chief of division, $2,500; one assistant chief of division, $1,600; one clerk, class 2, $1,400; two clerks, class 1, $2,400; in all, $7,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, one page 6, after line 13, to insert:

Division of Illustration: Chief artist and draftsman, $2,000; two assistant draftsmen, at $1,800 each, $3,200; three assistant artists, at $1,400 each, $4,200; one wood engraver, $1,800; one assistant wood engraver, $1,800; one assistant wood engraver, $1,200; in all, $14,200.

Mr. PLATT. Does this provision establish a new division?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is just a change in arrangement.

Mr. GEORGE. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to resist the amendment. I read from the letter of Assistant Secretary Dabney:

The salary roll of this division—

Speaking of the one now under consideration—was provided for in the estimates prepared a year ago. Investigation of the work of the division made since that time has shown the Secretary that the division does not make more than one-third to one-half of the illustrations used by the Department, and that the illustrations have cost us two or three times as much as they would have if prepared on the outside.

There is no more need of the Division of Illustrations in this Department than there is of a division of carpentering or any other mechanical profession. What the Department needs is a lump sum with which to purchase illustations, plates, and electrotypes desired, and with which to pay a limited number of artists in the various scientific divisions to make drawings of perishable fruits, insects, and natural history objects which can not be forwarded to artists on the outside. The lithographs and engravings from these pictures can then be made at a distance.

In a letter to the Committees of the House and Senate, the Secretary, therefore, asked that the salary roll of the Division of Illustrations be abolished, and that a lump sum be allowed in lieu thereof. This was done by the House committee.

For that reason I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment. It is utterly useless, and besides it is more extravagant than the provision which now exists by law.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 14, under the head of Illustrations and engravings, will be found this provision:

For the pay of artists, draftsmen, and engravers, the purchase of tools, instruments, paper, ink, pencils, paints, and other necessary materials; for printing proofs, necessary traveling expenses, labor, and for drawings, engravings, lithographs, other illustrations, and electrotypes, $15,000.

There has been constantly a division of illustrations, and a specific appropriation has been made for it. The bill as it came from the House leaves out that provision and inserts the paragraph which I have read, giving a lump sum of $15,000 to be used at the discretion of the Secretary in employing people and purchasing material, and doing just as he chooses. We strike all of that out of the bill, except a part leaving $2,000 for the purchase of materials, etc., and insert the paragraph which has been read, "Division of illustration: Chief artist and draftsman, $2,000," and so on, just as it is in respect to the other divisions, to make it correspond with them. The matter can go into conference and be adjusted there.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it will be very well for the Senate to do right about it now instead of leaving it to the conference committee. I have read to the Senate a statement of the Assistant Secretary that the amendment is wholly unnecessary and wasteful, and that the division does only a very small part of the work anyway; that most of it has to be done outside. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to that fact.

The Assistant Secretary says:

The salary roll of this division was provided for in the estimates prepared a year ago. Investigation of the work of the division made since that time has shown the Secretary that the division does not make more than one-third to one-half of the illustrations used by the Department.

So, when you establish your division, you have to go outside for about one-third or one-half of the work. The Secretary therefore recommends that the whole paragraph be stricken out, and that the appropriation be made as provided by the other House. Of course the judgment of the House of Representatives, or the judgment of the House Committee on Agriculture, or the judgment of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry does not count for much, but still it does look to me as though the reasons given here are perfectly competent.

You have to go outside for one-third or one-half of the work anyway and pay for it. You establish a division, which does not do the work, and the Secretary says that on full investigation and trial it has been found that this will not do.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I desire to say, touching the point under discussion, that the letter which has just been read brought to our attention before the Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, the fact that a portion of the work has to be let by contract necessarily, and that it is simply a question of amount as to how much shall be allowed in order that the Secretary may let the contracts.

As that can not be prevented, and contracts have to be entered into to consummate the work, I thought it proper to give my consent to a lump sum, although I am, on principle, opposed to lump appropriations under which contracts can be made. But as it is shown in the letter that the work can be done much cheaper in that way than it can possibly be done under the present arrangement, I gave my assent in this particular instance for the reasons mentioned in the letter of the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GEORGE. On that I call for a division.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 27, noes 7, no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	George,	Jones of Ark.	Proctor,
Bate,	Gibson,	Kyle,	Pugh,
Blackburn,	Gorman,	Lindsay,	Quay,
Brice,	Gray,	McLaurin,	Roach,
Call,	Hale,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Cockrell,	Hansbrough,	Mills,	Squire,
Coke,	Harris,	Pasco,	Stewart,
Dolph,	Hawley,	Patton,	Vest,
Dubois,	Hill,	Peffer,	Voorhees,
Faulkner,	Hunton,	Perkins,	Walsh,
Gallinger,	Jarvis,	Platt,	White.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on which a division is called for.

Mr. GEORGE. I withdraw the call for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, line 24, after the word "dollars," to insert "one superintendent of seed room, $1,600;" in line 25, after the word "dollars," to strike out "two experts, at $1,800 each, $3,600," and insert "one expert, $1,600;" on page 7, line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "eight employés, at $840 each, who shall in addition to other duties execute the requests of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for the distribution of seeds among their constituents;" and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "nine thousand" and insert "thirteen thousand seven hundred and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

Division of seeds; One chief of division, $2,000; one superintendent of seed room, $1,600; one expert, $1,600; two clerks of class 1, $2,400; one skilled laborer, $1,000; eight employés, at $840 each, who shall in addition to other duties execute the requests of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for the distribution of seeds among their constituents; in all, $13,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 11, after the word "dollars," to strike out "two chief folders, at $1,000 each, $2,000," and insert "one chief folder, $1,000; eight folders, at $60 per month each, $5,760;" and in line 16, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand six hundred" and insert "eight thousand three hundred and sixty," so as to make the clause read:

Document and folding room: One superintendent, $1,600; one chief folder, $1,000; eight folders, at $60 per month each, $5,760; in all, $8,360.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 24, to increase the total appropriations for salaries from "$238,220" to "$247,560."

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "forty-seven thousand five hundred and sixty" and inserting "sixty-two thousand seven hundred and sixty;" so as to read "$262,760."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 8, line 4, after the word "records," to strike out "printing, maps, and charts;" in line 9, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That $15,000 of this sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended in the collection and tabulation of data showing, so far as possible, the annual yield since the organization of this Government to the present time of all agricultural products, their annual cost of production, the cost of transportation each year from the place of production to the market or markets at which prices are quoted, and their annual market price or prices, and such data when collected and tabulated shall as often as practicable, and at least once in each year, be published and distributed the same as other farmers' bulletins, and so far as practicable such tabulation shall be made and given by States and subdivisions of a State.

In line 21, after the word "State," to insert "Provided;" in the same line, after the word "Provided," to strike out "further;" and in line 23, after the word "embrace," to strike out "only;" so as to make the clause read:

Collecting agricultural statistics, division of statistics: Collecting domestic and foreign agricultural statistics, expenses of local investigations and compilations, and necessary traveling expenses; statistical publications furnishing data for permanent comparative records; compiling, writing, and illustrating statistical matter for monthly, annual, and special reports, and the necessary expenses of the same, including paper, envelopes, postal cards, and postage stamps, $100,000: Provided, That the monthly crop report issued on the 10th day of each month shall embrace a statement of the condition of the crops by States and in the United States, with such explanations and comparisons with other months and years as may be useful for illustrating the above matter, and that it shall be submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall officially approve the report before it is issued or published.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 12, after the word "making," to strike out "for preparing, printing, and publishing bulletins and reports on this subject for distribution;" so as to make the clause read:

Inquiries relating to public roads: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to the system of road management throughout the United States, to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road-making, and to enable him to assist the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject, $10,000.

Mr. GEORGE. I was requested by the Agricultural Department to move to amend the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations by striking out merely the words "printing and publishing" and restoring the words "for preparing bulletins and reports on this subject for distribution."

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask how the bulletins can be prepared for distribution unless they are printed and published. It seems to me that is a strange amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are to be prepared for distribution.

Mr. PASCO. How can they be prepared for distribution if they are not to be printed and published?

Mr. COCKRELL. Congress will determine whether to print them and how many shall be printed, and so on.

Mr. PASCO. This appropriation is for a specific purpose, and what is the use of preparing the reports for distribution when there is a restriction against printing and publishing them?

Mr. CALL. I understand that they are published at the Government Printing Office under the general law.

Mr. PASCO. They will not be if the amendment is adopted.

Mr. CALL. The general appropriation act provides for printing these bulletins and reports. They will not be printed under the amendment, as my colleague says, but they will be published under the general appropriation for the Printing Office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I am also instructed to ask the Senator to insert after the word "making," in line 14, page 9, the words "for traveling and other necessary expenses and;" so that the clause will read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to the system of road management throughout the United States, to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making, for traveling and other necessary expenses, and for preparing bulletins and reports on this subject for distribution, and to enable him to assist the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in disseminating information on this subject, $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 10, line 6, after the word "horticulture," to insert "by inspection and experiments in nurseries and orchards when necessary;" so as to make the clause read:

Investigating the history and habits of insects: Promotion of economic entomology, investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, arboriculture, and horticulture, by inspection and experiments in nurseries and orchards when necessary, experiments in ascertaining the best means of destroying the injurious ones, publishing reports thereon, and for illustrations, chemicals, and other expenses in the practical work in the division of entomology, $20,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 22, after the word "animals," to insert "birds," and in line 25, after the word "four," to strike out "printing and:" so as to make the clause read:

Investigations in ornithology and mammalogy, division of ornithology and mammalogy: For biological investigations, including the geographic distribution and migrations of animals, birds, and plants, and for the promotion of economic ornithology and mammalogy, an investigation of the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry; for publishing reports thereon, and for illustrations, field work, and traveling and other expenses in the practical work of the division, $17,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 17, after the word "procured," to insert "by purchase or otherwise;" in line 22, after the word "samples," to strike out "as offered," and on page 13, line 2, after the word "where," to insert "when;" so as to read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to extend and continue the investigation of the adulteration of food, drugs, and liquors, including samples offered by consumers and those procured by purchase or otherwise by the Secretary of Agriculture from such sources and persons as he may deem advisable and the investigation of which will be most conducive to the public good, traveling expenses, stationery, return postage, printing, and illustrations, analyzing, investigating, and examining such samples, $5,000; and for these purposes the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons as he may deem necessary: Provided, That the Secretary is hereby required to make a separate report to Congress as to where, when, and from whom the samples of food, liquors, and drugs were obtained.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, to strike out lines 21, 22, 23, and 24, in the following words:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to further experiment and continue the investigation of flax and hemp culture for fiber purposes in the State of Washington, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 7, after the word "For," to strike out "the pay of artists, draftsmen, and engravers;" in line 10, after the word "materials," to insert "and," and in line 10, after the word "proofs," to strike out "necessary traveling expenses, labor, and for drawings, engravings, lithographs, other illustrations, and electrotypes, fifteen, and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

Illustrations and engravings: For the purchase of tools, instruments, paper, ink, pencils, paints, and other necessary materials, and for printing proofs, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 20, before the word "seeds," to insert "valuable," and in line 25, after the word "dollars," to strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That this purchase and distribution of seeds shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another.

So as to make the clause read:

For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expense of labor, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $160,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 10, after the word "constituents," to insert "or be directed and mailed by the Department upon their request," and on page 19, after the word "same," to insert:

And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propogation, and distribution of improved and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided, however.

So as to make the clause read:

An equal proportion of two-thirds of all seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents or be directed and mailed by the Department upon their request; and the person receiving such seeds shall be requested to inform the Department of results of the experiments therewith: Provided, That all seeds, bulbs, plants, and cuttings herein allotted to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution remaining uncalled for on the 1st of May shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the Department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase, but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of improved and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided, however, etc.

Mr. GEORGE. I am instructed by the Agricultural Department to say that the proposed provision at the end of the paragraph is unnecessary, as such a declaration is already in the general law on that subject. I will say on my own account that the repetition of this injunction in the bill seems to be to cast censure upon the Department, at least to the extent that it seems to require an additional provision to prevent them from doing wrongly with money appropriated from the Treasury.

Mr. CALL. A similar provision is contained in the current law.

Mr. COCKRELL. A like provision is in the current law, but it is not in the permanent law. Such a provision is in last year's appropriation act, and it is put in here in precisely the same shape. There is no more reflection by the provision to-day than there was a year ago.

Mr. GEORGE. I am informed that such a provision is in the general law.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, only in the appropriation act.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to say that I wish the Secretary of Agriculture would obey the law a little more literally than he does. The law now provides that he shall spend this money for improved seeds and bulbs, etc. The fact is that he buys seeds which are common in the market, and does not get hold of any improved seeds for distribution until two or three years after they are on sale everywhere.

Mr. CALL. This provision is not in the permanent law. It is in the appropriation act, and expired with the fiscal year; and it should be put in the bill as it was in the last appropriation act and in the preceding one. It is not in the permanent law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 19, line 17, after the word "amount," to strike out "here" and insert "herein," and in line 21, after the word "shall," to strike out "upon their request;" so as to make the clause read:

And the Secretary of Agriculture may use not to exceed $30,000 of the amount herein appropriated for the preparation, printing, and publishing of farmers' bulletins, which shall be adapted to the interests of the people of different sections of the country, an equal proportion of two-thirds of which shall be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents as seeds are distributed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 10, page 20.

Mr. GEORGE. In line 9, page 20, my attention has been called to the fact that the word "repairing" before "printing" is an unnecessary repetition of the word. I move to strike out the word "repairing," where it occurs the second time in the line, so as to read:

For printing and for repairing, and for printing presses, $5,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 20, line 13, after the word "cane," to strike out "and;" in line 14, after the word "beets," to insert "and sorghum," and in the same line, after the word "culture," to strike out "and;" so as to make the clause read:

Experiments in the manufacture of sugar: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make and continue experiments in the production of sugar from sugar cane, sugar beets, and sorghum, including special culture experiments looking to the improvement of those sources of sugar, and for experiments for the more complete separation of the sugar from the molasses, including all necessary expenses in these investigations, namely, traveling expenses, labor, purchase of samples, apparatus, and supplies, chemical services, including $250 additional temporary compensation to the chief chemist, and other expenses incidental to the experiments, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 14, after the word "investigations," to strike out:

Division of irrigation inquiry: Investigating the amount of water necessary to irrigate the various soils of arid regions of the United States, and the amount of evaporation from the same, the proper methods of water measurements, special observations of the snowfall and rainfall in irrigated regions and districts, the purchase of instruments and technical works and publications on said subjects, and for temporary local assistance and necessary traveling expenses, $8,000.

And insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $6,000;

So as to make the clause read:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $6,000.

Mr. GEORGE. I am instructed to ask the Senate not to concur in that amendment. There are two objections to it. In the first place, the appropriation is reduced in a very important matter from $8,000 to $6,000; and, in the second place, the range of the Secretary of Agriculture in investigating that very important subject is very much circumscribed. I ask the Secretary to read the matter in the bill as it came from the other House which is proposed to be stricken out, so that the Senate may see that there is not anything in it that ought not to remain there.

The Secretary read the paragraph proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. PEFFER. Before leaving the amendment of the committee at the bottom of page 22, I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the peculiar wording of the amendment. It reads:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the collection of information as to the best modes of agriculture by irrigation, $6,000.

Information as to the best method of agriculture is not what the farmers desire the work of the Secretary to be. What the farmers are anxious to have from the Secretary of Agriculture is that he may assist them in ascertaining the sources of water and the best method of furnishing water to be applied artificially to the land. That is what the farmers want, and I hope when the bill goes into conference the conferees will change the reading of the amendment so as to amount to what we really need.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to inquire whether the reduction from $8,000 to $6,000 reduces the sum appropriated below the estimate for the Agricultural Department. This is quite an important subject, and it is a very small amount of money.

Mr. GEORGE. The Agricultural Department recommend $8,000.

Mr. WHITE. I think if the Agricultural Department recommended $8,000 they ought to have it for two reasons; in the first place, because it is an important matter, and secondly, because we know that Department of the Government is conducted most economically. It has become well known all over the country that the present Secretary of Agriculture is one of the most economical gentlemen connected with any Department of the Government. I do not believe he would recommend anything in the slightest degree excessive.

Mr. CALL. I will inform the Senator from California that the estimate for the Secretary of Agriculture is $8,000.

Mr. WHITE. I think it ought to remain. It is a very important interest. A large portion of the United States is affected by this matter. Of course, it is not very extensively represented in Congress, but the sum of money recommended by the Department is small, and I think it ought to be appropriated. Eight thousand dollars is not a great deal.

Mr. POWER. An appropriation has been made from year to year of from six to eight thousand dollars on the subject of irrigation, and the money has been used in paying the expenses in the Agricultural Department, and for no other purpose. Consequently the appropriation is a failure.

It should be larger or nothing at all should be appropriated. If it is in order, I will move that it be made $60,000 in place of $6,000. Otherwise I am in favor of striking out the whole item. I am advised that this small appropriation is of no practical use whatever. We appropriate annually $6,000 for this work which about pays for the running of the office here, the man in charge with nothing to do, I believe. That is the present situation. We should have $60,000 to begin with, so as to utilize this branch of the service. I offer that as an amendment.

Mr. CALL. After the committee amendments are through the amendment of the Senator from Montana will be in order. I will state that an additional sum, if any should be required, can be provided hereafter. If the Senate should desire to engage largely in experiments for irrigation, the appropriation can be made in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The clause which is proposed to be stricken out has not been in any appropriation bill. The proposed amendment has been in the law for the fiscal years 1892 and 1893 at $6,000. We are now giving exactly the same amount, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to. If there is to be any further expenditures it will come in on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 23, line 6, after the word "hereby," to strike out "authorized," and insert "required;" so as to make the clause read:

Nutrition: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the nutritive value of the various articles and commodities used for human food, with special suggestion of full, wholesome, and edible rations less wasteful and more economical than those in common use, $10,000; and the agricultural experiment stations are hereby required to coöperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out said investigations in such manner and to such extent as may be warranted by a due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States or Territories as may be mutually agreed upon; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to require said stations to report to him the results of any such investigations which they may carry out, whether in coöperation with said Secretary of Agriculture or otherwise.

Mr. QUAY. I understand the Senator from Florida in charge of the bill will agree to have the word "required" stricken out and the word "authorized" reinstated, as the bill passed the other House.

Mr. CALL. I stated that so far as I was concerned myself, as a member of the committee, I would make no objection to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. What objection has the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment?

Mr. QUAY. I will state the objection. The Senator from Missouri has the bill before him. From the word "dollars," in line 6, to the end of the first paragraph on page 23, the clause was drafted at the Agricultural College of Pennsylvania, and it represents, I think, the ideas of those institutions throughout the country. It was in the nature of a tender of services to the Secretary of Agriculture on the part of those institutions. While they desire authority to coöperate with the Department it is not their desire to be subjected to authority. They wish to commence and continue their investigations according to the conditions and laws of the States in which they are located.

Mr. CALL. The Senator will allow me to state that there was serious objection made on the part of the superintendent of the experimental station of Pennsylvania to the word "required," on the ground that he thought it was better that the experiment stations should be left free to initiate these investigations for themselves. I do not see any great difference between the words "authorized" and "required," inasmuch as there is no method of requiring or compelling them to do anything. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am content to restore the word "authorized" if the other members of the committee are willing.

Mr. QUAY. Then let the amendment of the committee be voted down.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no objection to that course. Let the amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 23, line 16, after the word "repairing," to strike out "and improving;" so as to make the clause read:

Furniture cases and repairs: Repairing buildings, heating apparatus, furniture, carpeting, matting, water and gas pipes, new furniture, and all necessary material and labor for the same, including lumber, hardware, glass, and paints, $10,000.

Mr. GEORGE. I have a memorandum from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture in reference to the pending amendment. He wants the words "and improving," which are proposed to be stricken out, retained. He says:

Without these words the language is not sufficient to cover necessary changes in buildings.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does he only say changes in buildings or does he mean new additions to buildings?

Mr. GEORGE. He says "changes."

Mr. COCKRELL. He said to our committee that he wanted authority to put up new buildings there, and it was for that very reason that we struck out the words "and improving," because we thought best not to expend any more money in mere temporary, inflammable buildings there until we could put up a building that would be permanent. They have now a lot of plain buildings stuck around there that are liable to be fired at any time and consume the whole place.

We do not want any more temporary structures, frame buildings, put up there, covering the whole ground. The time is coming and is doubtless very near when some permanent additional buildings will be put up there. They ought to be of a permanent character, and we did not want any more money spent for temporary structures.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator from Missouri has misapplied, unintentionally of course, the language of the Secretary of Agriculture.

It was intended for the amendment to be found on the last line, line 25, page 29, and upon that point I have a memorandum. I think the language he used was applied to that amendment, not to this one. If I remember correctly, the Assistant Secretary told me that it becomes necessary sometimes in order to adjust certain rooms in the Department of Agriculture to certain purposes to make a partition.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would all be covered by "repairing."

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. By "rearranging," then.

Mr. GEORGE. He said "repairing" would not do it, and he wanted the word "improving" inserted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us put in the word "rearrangement."

Mr. GEORGE. "Repairing and improving," are the words he suggested. I do not care what language you put in, so it gives him power to put up a partition if he needs it.

Mr. HARRIS. "Repairing and rearranging."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let "repairing and rearranging" go instead of "improving."

Mr. GEORGE. That is satisfactory to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 16, after the word "repairing," strike out "and improving" and insert "and rearranging."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 24, line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand two hundred" and insert "five thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Fiber investigation: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the investigations relating to textile fibers indigenous in or adapted to the United States, including their economic growth, cleansing, and decorticating preparatory to manufacture; the testing machines and processes for said cleansing and decorticating; for the purchase of material for said tests; for the purchase of fiber plants and seeds for distribution, propagation, and experiment; and for the labor and expenses incident thereto, and for traveling expenses in connection with said duties, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 6 on page 25.

Mr. CALL. In the item for "contingent expenses" after the word "stationery," in line 20, page 24, I move to insert the words "purchase of blank books."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 25, line 10, before the word "seal," to strike out "executive" and insert "official;" so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to procure a proper seal, with such suitable inscriptions and devices as he may approve, to be known as the official seal of the Department of Agriculture, and to be kept and used to verify official documents, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 3, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" in line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five thousand four" and insert "three thousand six;" in line 6, before the word "stationery," to strike out "assistant;" and in line 18, before the word "hundred," to strike out "sixty-four thousand two" and insert "sixty-two thousand four;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, transferring the Weather Bureau to the Department of Agriculture: One Chief of the Bureau, $4,500; one assistant chief, $3,000; two professors of meteorology, at $3,000 each, $6,000; three professors of meteorology, at $2,500 each, $7,500; three forecast officials, at $2,000 each, $6,000, for service in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the exigencies of the Bureau may demand; one chief clerk, $2,250; three chiefs of divisions, $2,000 each, $6,000; two clerks of class 4, $3,600; one bibliographer and librarian, $1,600; one stationery and property clerk, $1,600; five clerks of class 3, $8,000; fourteen clerks of class 2, $19,600; twenty-eight clerks of class 1, $33,600; eighteen clerks, at $1,000 each, $18,000; two telegraph operators, at $1,000 each, $2,000, for service in the city of Washington or elsewhere, as the exigencies of the Bureau may demand; seven clerks, at $900 each, $6,300; four copyists or typewriters, at $840 each, $3,360; one copyist or typewriter, $720; one chief mechanician, $1,200; one captain of the watch, $1,000; one engineer, $840; one battery man, $840; four skilled artisans, at $840 each, $3,360; two skilled mechanicians, at $840 each, $1,680; three assistant messengers, at $720 each, $2,160; two firemen, at $720 each, $1,440; three watchmen, at $720 each, $2,160; one carpenter, $720; five laborers, at $660 each, $3,300; seven messengers, or laborers, at $600 each, $4,200; six messengers, or laborers, at $450 each, $2,700; five messengers, or laborers, at $300 each, $1,500; four charwomen, $240 each, $960; for temporary employment of messengers and laborers, as may be necessary in the office of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, $800; in all, $162,490; and the Secretary is hereby authorized to make such changes or assignment to duty in the personnel or detailed force of the Weather Bureau for limiting or reducing expenses as he may deem necessary.

Mr. CALL. I move that the amendment of the committee be disagreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I rose to object to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee report to insert the word "at," in line 10, page 27, before the word "four," which will be agreed to in the absence of objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 28, line 14, after the word "inspectors," to insert "whose compensation in the aggregate shall not exceed $5,400;" so as to read:

Salaries of three inspectors, whose compensation in the aggregate shall not exceed $5,400, thirty local forecast officials, observers, assistant observers, operators, repairmen, messengers, and other necessary civilian employés, outside of the city of Washington, $347,195; and the Secretary is hereby authorized to make promotions in the service without prejudice to those transferred from the Signal Service of the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 25, after the word "for," to strike out "providing" and insert "temporary rent of;" so as to read:

For supplies for State weather service stations; for apparatus, assistance, supplies, labor, printing, books; for temporary rent of a building or additional apartments, etc.

Mr. GEORGE. I was requested to resist that amendment. I will read a paragraph from a letter of the Assistant Secretary which explains the ground upon which the resistance is made:

Under General expenses of the "Weather Bureau," page 29, line 25, restore the words "providing a building," as in House bill. Investigation has been made, and it has been ascertained that no suitable building convenient to the Department can be rented for this purpose. What is proposed is to alter and improve existing buildings of the Department so as to accommodate the the new Division of Agricultural Soils, and this language is necessary in order to accomplish it.

Mr. COCKRELL. They want to put up a new building?

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why do you wish the words "for providing a building or additional apartments?" If you want to rearrange the building say so. I understood distinctly from the Assistant Secretary that they want to put up a temporary building there.

Mr. GEORGE. I will read again what he says:

Investigation has been made, and it has been ascertained that no suitable building convenient to the Department can be rented for this purpose.

So, therefore, the provision for renting is unnecessary.

What is proposed is, to alter and improve existing buildings of the Department so as to accommodate the new Division of Agricultural Soils.

If the Senator from Missouri thinks "providing" will authorize the erection of a building suppose he inserts the words "for altering."

Mr. COCKRELL. And rearranging.

Mr. GEORGE. "Altering and improving existing buildings." Will that do?

Mr. HARRIS. And to build additions. That is what you want.

Mr. GEORGE. "Altering and improving."

Mr. COCKRELL. For rearranging existing buildings, not to exceed $2,000.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator agree to that?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am willing. I do not think, and I so stated to the Secretary, that we would be justified in permitting additional frame buildings to be attached to the existing frame structures that are around there.

Mr. GEORGE. They do not want to erect them.

Mr. COCKRELL. If they want to rearrange them let them do it, but I do not want to provide for additional buildings to add to the danger of fire, so that the whole place will be swept away.

Mr. GEORGE. In order to accommodate the Senator from Missouri, I propose to insert two words, so as to read: "For altering and improving a building or additional apartments," etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. "Additional apartments?" What does that mean? What the Senator suggests explains the whole thing.

Mr. GEORGE. Strike out "additional," then, and say "buildings or apartments." Will that do?

Mr. COCKRELL. "Altering and rearranging." Use the same words we inserted before.

Mr. GEORGE. Will "altering and rearranging" suit you?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; and then strike out "additional apartments."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment of the committee is withdrawn. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "for," in line 25, on page 29, it is proposed to insert "for altering and rearranging a building;" and after the word "building," in line 25, to strike out "or additional apartments."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 30, line 1, after the word "apartments," to insert "in the city of Washington, not to exceed $2,000."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 9, after the word "Washington," to insert "not to exceed $500;" and in line 10, after the word "navigation," to strike out "not to exceed $500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 15, before the word "counterfeit," to strike out "false or," and in line 16, before the word "representing," to insert "falsely;" so as to make the clause read:

Any person who shall knowingly issue or publish any counterfeit weather forecasts or warnings of weather conditions, falsely representing such forecasts or warnings to have been issued or published by the Weather Bureau, United States Signal Service, or other branch of the Government service, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, for each offense be fined in a sum not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not to exceed ninety days, or be both fined and imprisoned in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 22, to strike out:

That the Secretary of Agriculture, in coöperation with the Postmaster-General, shall arrange a plan by which there shall be displayed on all cars and other conveyances used for transporting United States mail, suitable flags or other signals to indicate weather forecasts, cold-wave warnings, frost warnings, etc., to be furnished by the Chief of the Weather Bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 5, after the word "and," to strike out "seventy-six thousand eight hundred" and insert "seventy-five thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Total Weather Bureau, $875,023.06.

Mr. COCKRELL. That amendment should be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the committee if there is any objection to making an amendment on page 10, in the provision for investigating "the natural history of and remedies for the cotton boll-worm," and adding at that point "and the leaf worm." The leaf worm is as destructive to cotton as the boll-worm.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 15, after the word "boll-worm," it is proposed to insert "and the leaf worm."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I understand there are some amendments to be offered, one by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and I propose that we adjourn and consider that amendment to-morrow morning.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to offer the amendment now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be stated subject to any point of order.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

RUSSIAN CACTUS.

For the destruction of the Russian cactus (technically salsoli koli tragus), $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture among the several States infested by Russian cactus, said apportionment to be made in accordance with the necessities of the case, to be ascertained by the Secretary, and to be paid to the governor of each of said States upon his executing an obligation on behalf of his State that the sum so paid shall be faithfully applied in connection with any sum which may be raised for that purpose in his State for the destruction of said cactus.

Mr. COCKRELL. I reserve all points of order on that amendment.

DEATH OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HOUK.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, communicated the resolutions of the House commemorative of the life, character, and public services of Hon. George W. Houk, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Mr. BRICE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read:

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 14, 1891.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of the Hon. George W. Houk, lately a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these proceedings to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BRICE. Mr. President, I wish to state that at a subsequent time I shall ask the Senate to set aside a day when appropriate tribute may be paid to the memory of my late colleague in the House of Representatives. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 17, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 16, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

DAMAGE TO FOOD FISH IN WABASH RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Fish Commissioner, transmitting, pursuant to House resolution, information as to the damage done to food fish in Wabash River by reason of the discharge into said river of the overflow and waste products of the oil wells in the town of Terre Haute, Ind.; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read twice, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

A bill (S. 2055) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Duck River, in Humphreys County, Tenn.; and

A bill (S. 2139) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, from a point within the limits of the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, known as Eagle Point, to the opposite bank of said river, in the county of Grant and State of Wisconsin.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH YAKIMA INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 2015) granting to the Columbia Irrigation Company a right of way through the Yakima Indian Reservation, in Washington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. These amendments of the Senate are merely formal, and have been adopted in accordance with the recommendation of the Indian Department. I move that they be concurred in.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let the amendments be read.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

The motion of Mr. WILSON of Washington was agreed to, and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

YUMA INDIANS IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1919) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Yuma Indians in California for the cession of their surplus lands, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill was amended by the House; the Senate has disagreed to the House amendments, and has asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion of Mr. HUNTER was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. HUNTER, Mr. LYNCH, and Mr. PICKLER, as conferees on the part of the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs may be discharged from the further consideration of Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 6742, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes; that the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I wish to inquire whether the amendment of the Senate, in which the gentleman moves to nonconcur, is the appropriation for the Vesuvius.

Mr. CUMMINGS. There is with the other amendments one containing an appropriation for the Vesuvius.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to know something about the attitude of the committee on that matter. Gentlemen will remember that that was before the House in a separate bill, and was partly discussed. I understand the appropriation has been put on this naval appropriation bill as an amendment of the Senate.

I would like to have in some form that amendment brought before the House so that we can have a vote directly on the question as to whether the parties interested shall be reimbursed the sum of $50,000 that was taken from them by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Thirty thousand, not fifty thousand. I can not speak, of course, for the conferees; they have not yet been appointed on the part of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But of course you understand who they will be.

Mr. SAYERS. I would suggest, if the gentleman from New York will permit me, that it is usual when there is a particular amendment placed by the Senate on a bill which has been a subject of discussion in the House, that the conferees shall bring in such proposition in a shape so that it may receive the direct action of the House.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I wish to say to the gentleman that I shall endeavor to carry out the usual method of procedure in such cases.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. That is all I ask. I desire that the question shall be brought before the House, and an opportunity given for discussion; and the conferees can then be governed by the action of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from the further consideration of this appropriation bill, to nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate to the same, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. Is there objection?

Mr. BABCOCK. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then I move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from the further consideration of this bill, nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded? If not, it will be regarded as ordered by unanimous consent.

A second was ordered by consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen on each side, if any gentleman desire to occupy the floor. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. CUMMINGS, Mr. GEISSENHAINER, and Mr. DOLLIVER as conferees on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GEAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to take up Senate bill 2139, being the bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Dubuque, Iowa, and desire to preface the request with a single statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Wisconsin has demanded the regular order, and that, of course, is equivalent to an objection to all requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. GEAR. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. GEAR. I move to suspend the rules——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has been recognized.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6518) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. RANSOM, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. DOLPH as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6080) granting a certain military reservation to Oklahoma City, Oklahoma Territory, to aid the public free schools thereof, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. MCLAURIN, and Mr. PETTIGREW as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

INTERFERENCE WITH UNITED STATES LAWS, TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS, AND INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives indorses the prompt and vigorous efforts of the President and his Administration to suppress lawlessness, restore order, and prevent improper interference with the enforcement of the laws of the United States and with the transportation of the mails of the United States and with interstate commerce, and pledges the President hearty support, and deems the success that has already attended his efforts cause for public and general congratulation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded on the motion?

Mr. PENCE. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. PENCE, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. MCCREARY, as tellers.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Colorado to withdraw his call for a second, and let it be ordered by unanimous consent, and then let the question come up on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to a second being ordered by consent?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty minutes are allowed for debate under the rules, fifteen for and fifteen against the resolution. The gentleman from Kentucky will be recognized to control the time in favor of the resolution, and the gentleman from Colorado in opposition to it.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I shall desire to say anything on a resolution that is so easily understood and which I think is so appropriate. I will therefore reserve my time and use it hereafter if it shall become necessary. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many other members on the floor had notice that at this time there was to be an effort made to introduce a resolution of this character, indorsing the course of the Administration. I had no idea that anything of the kind would come up this morning. I did see in the newspapers a few days ago that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STORER] had formulated a resolution something in line with that which had been adopted by the Senate, but I had supposed that as the time had run on three or four days, and the House had not taken any action on the matter, that that was the end of it.

We have now this resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives indorses the prompt and vigorous efforts of the President and his Administration to suppress lawlessness, restore order, and prevent improper inteference with the enforcement of the laws of the United States, and with the transportation of the mails of the United States and with interstate commerce; and pledges the President hearty support, and deems the success that has already attended his efforts as cause for public and general congratulation.

Mr. Speaker, the citizen of this country, and certainly the member of this House, who would withhold from the Administration proper praise in a time of great emergency would be a public enemy. The member of this House or the member of the Senate who would attempt to discuss party matters or make a party discussion over a resolution of this kind would be a public enemy. But this resolution, in my judgment, is broader than this House, if guided by its conscience and its better judgment, is willing to adopt. It goes certainly further than the old line State-rights Democrats of the House will want to record themselves. It certainly goes further than the Republican side of this House can want to go, because the framer of the resolution rests the indorsement not only upon the orders made by the President himself, but in terms it is drawn so as to indorse the efforts of the President "and his Administration."

Mr. Speaker, there may be proper times in this country, in case of dispute between striking laboring men and the corporations which employ them, for calling out the strongest arm of the Government. We all admit that. It may be proper to issue injunctions of the Federal courts. It may be proper to demand indictments by Federal grand juries. It may be proper to call out the military; but, Mr. Speaker, in my humble judgment, the American people will never believe that the Attorney-General who orders the indictments, who orders the injunctions, who orders the military, should be either the attorney of one of those corporations, a stockholder in any one of them, or a member of the board of directors of any one of them. It may be that emergencies may arise where all that the President has done in this case would be proper and right.

This is no time to discuss that matter, nor is this the place; but a resolution which asks this House to indorse the course of the President and his Administration implies that now and here we stand ready to approve the action of every branch of the Administration, and above all that branch which has been most active in this matter, which is the legal department. Do the Democrats of this House stand ready to indorse the course of the Attorney-General? Is there a Democrat here who believes that it was the right, decent, meet, and proper thing, when the Attorney-General came to name and designate a special deputy to take charge in Chicago, that he should designate the attorney of railroad companies there? I think not.

Is there a Democrat upon this floor who stands ready, of record, to say that it was the meet and proper and decent thing, calling for our praise and our congratulation, that a gentleman who has been an attorney of trusts, who was one when he was appointed, who has continued so to be for a year, and is so to-day, according to the charges made in the New York World and other leading Democratic papers, should be the leader in the Administration which they now seek to praise, in calling into force the strong arm of the Federal judiciary, the strong arm of the military?

Mr. Speaker, there are a few of us here, I am sure, who are not ready to vote for any such resolution of praise.

I reserve the balance of my time. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLAND and Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky addressed the chair.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky was recognized.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in considering the resolution which has just been reported, we should not be partisans but we should all be patriots. I believe that Republicans, Populists, and Democrats can consistently support the resolution.

It is known to all that the issues which during the last two weeks confronted the President and the country were serious and dangerous. The questions involved were, Shall law and order prevail, or shall mobocracy triumph? Shall the Government provided for in the Constitution be maintained, or shall anarchy and defiance of law reign supreme? Shall prosperity and peace continue in our country, or shall we have the horrors of civil strife?

The President of the United States and the members of his Administration met the crisis intelligently, courageously, promptly, and patriotically. Something more was at stake than the rights of laboring men or the rights of capitalists or the rights of railroad corporations—questions which concerned the prosperity and freedom of 65,000,000 of people; and the perpetuity also of national government in its power and in its purity were at stake; and it was soon made plain that those who were not for the Government were against it, and that those who were not in favor of upholding the law were in favor of the mob.

Mr. Speaker, while I am in favor of recognizing fully and entirely the rights of labor, and while I am in favor of recognizing the rights of capital, I believe that higher than both of these is the preservation of the Republic and the enforcement of the law.

The poorest man in this country as well as the richest man, the farmer, the mechanic, the laboring man and the professional man, and all men, are interested in preserving peace and law and order; and I believe that to-day throughout our country 65,000,000 of people are gratified because our "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people" has triumphed over the proposed government of secret societies; and I believe the people are gratified everywhere that lawless men and agitators have been compelled to submit to the power and authority of organized government. There was ample authority for the position taken by the President and the members of his Administration.

The Congress of the United States has the plain constitutional authority "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, to establish post-offices and post-roads, and to ordain and establish inferior courts;" and the judicial power extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. It is the duty of the President under the Constitution to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed;" and to this end it is provided that he shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States as well as of the militia of the States when called into the active service of the United States.

The statutes of the United States authorize the recent action taken by the President under section 5298, enacted July 29, 1861, and section 5299, enacted April 20, 1871, which I will embody in my remarks.

The sections are as follows:

Section 5298, enacted July 29, 1861: "Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce by the course of judicial proceedings the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed."

Section 5299, enacted April 20, 1871:

"Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstruct or hinder the execution of the laws thereof and of the United States as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection, named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect or from any cause fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States, or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations."

The commission to be selected by the President and the commission to be appointed by action of Congress will, I have no doubt, discharge their duties fairly and impartially, but at the present time it is proper and right that we should indorse and congratulate those who so courageously and ably and promptly performed their duties. I therefore ask the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what disposition he has made of his time, as he promised to yield some time to me?

Mr. BLAND. I am to speak in the time given to me by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE].

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will ask the Speaker how much time I have remaining?

Mr. BLAND. I want the time of the gentleman from Colorado.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky has seven minutes of his time remaining. How much time does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PENCE. The gentleman asked for all I had. I suppose there is six minutes remaining.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PENCE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PENCE. How much time is allotted to each side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifteen minutes to each side. The gentleman used nine minutes, and has six remaining.

Mr. BLAND. This, Mr. Speaker, is a very important question. It is not simply——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have fifteen minutes. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. BLAND. Six minutes is all I desire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri have fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. BLAND. I believe, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I can not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. Gentlemen will cease conversation or retire to the cloak-room.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that a resolution of this character should be thrust in here under a fifteen-minute rule for debate, because it opens a wide field for discussion; not but that I believe any member of this House, no matter to what political party he belongs, will indorse the State government and the Federal Government in all legitimate efforts to preserve our institutions, to put down riots, and preserve the majesty of the laws of this country. I have no sympathy, Mr. Speaker, with any man who raises his arm in violence to destroy property to enforce what he may consider his rights of work, and try to prevent others from working. No principle of that kind can find indorsement on the part of anyone who has a proper conception of the rights of the people of this country to liberty.

But, sir, in these great disturbing times, such as we have passed through, it often occurs that acts are done under an assumption of authority that we may be called upon to indorse by a sweeping resolution of this character. I am, as a Democrat, to-day where I have always been; and that is for the rights and the dignity of the people of the States. I believe in local State Government, and that the whole arm of the State authority should be used in suppressing violence before the Federal Government should interfere, except to protect its own property and to protect its mails.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that throughout this country, even in States where there was no violence, and where if violence occurred at all, the State authorities were ready and able to deal with it without any instructions sent out by the Attorney-General. The whole country was flooded with deputy marshals; sheriffs were arrested, State authority was overthrown, and the strong arm of the Federal Government took possession of matters properly belonging to the States. Against that, sir, I protest. I protest against these blanket Federal injunctions. I protest against the omnibus injunction. I object to sending deputy marshals all over the country to take the place of State authority; and that in a measure like that resolution, in the excitement of the times, we are as a party, as a Democratic party, liable to do violence to every Democratic principle and to surrender here, in these Halls, as representatives of the people of our States, the essential Democratic principle of local self-government. If this Union is to be maintained, it is to be maintained by maintaining and respecting the rights and the authority of the people of the States.

If we are to have imperialism, let it not come with the assent of the representatives of the people in this House. I have not heard that resoultion read so as to know precisely what it is. I may vote for it when I understand its scope, but if so, I shall do it with the distinct reservation that I protest against many of the acts that were committed under Federal authority in my State which were absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

Mr. PENCE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment in order that I may ask unanimous consent that ten minutes additional time be granted to each side.

Mr. BRETZ and others objected.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I trust that that objection will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. Objection is made and the matter is not debatable.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make another request, namely, that five minutes additional time be granted to each side; and I will state that I desire the five minutes additional time on this side for the benefit of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. CATCHINGS, Mr. BRETZ, and others objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] is recognized.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, there is no question of State rights involved in the proposition embodied in this resolution. No man believes more sincerely than I do that it is necessary for the future prosperity and greatness of this country that due observance shall be given to those limitations in the Constitution which define the rights of the States on the one hand and of the General Government on the other. But, Mr. Speaker, it must not be forgotten that it is written in the Constitution that it and the laws made in pursuance thereof constitute the supreme law of this land; and when it comes to executing the Federal authority, let it always be remembered that the shadow of the national flag obscures and obliterates all State lines. There is not a nook or corner or crevice in all this broad land of ours where the power of the Federal Government may not lawfully go when proper occasion arises.

Mr. Speaker, no man who has spoken here, and no one who will speak, will undertake to point out a single thing that has been done by the President and those who have acted with him that has not been for the purpose of maintaining the Constitution and the laws that have been enacted in pursuance thereof. So far as the matters are concerned which the gentleman from Colorado has commented upon as against the Attorney-General, I wish to say here, speaking not only as a Representative, but as a member of the legal profession, that in my judgment the course of the Attorney-General has been such as to command the admiration and inspire the confidence of every good citizen. He is an able lawyer, a brilliant and distinguished member of his profession, and he could not have done less than he has done and at the same time have discharged his duty to the country.

Mr. Speaker, it is not to be tolerated that any class of citizens in this country shall take the law into their own hands. It can not be permitted that commerce between the States shall be paralyzed and that loss shall be inflicted by the millions of dollars upon the people of this country simply because a dispute has arisen between one class of our citizens and another. I say that the President has commended himself to the favorable judgment and the kindly and thoughtful consideration of the people of this country by the lofty, the determined, the courageous attitude which he has assumed in this dreadful controversy, and I hope it will have taught a lesson to men like Debs and others who choose to organize within the body of our citizenship a special class which claims the right to lay its heavy hand upon the business of the country and disturb and paralyze it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The time for debate has expired, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The resolution was again read as above.

The question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and 23 members voted in the affirmative—not a sufficient number.

Mr. HEPBURN. Count the other side.

The question was taken; and there were—23 ayes, 125 noes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Upon the question of ordering tellers, 18 members voted in the affirmative—not a sufficient number, so tellers were refused. The yeas and nays were refused. The resolution was then adopted, two-thirds, in the opinion of the Chair, having voted in favor thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6748) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GORMAN, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. HALE as the conferees on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2208) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River at the foot of Main street, in the borough of Bellevernon, in the State of Pennsylvania; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. TELLER be excused as one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 6373) "making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," and that Mr. ALLISON be appointed in his place.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5894) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I present a report from the Committee on Rules.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider House bill 4099, "a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy," in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That after an hour of general debate there shall be two hours' debate under the five-minute rule. The previous question shall be considered ordered on the amendments, if any, and, without intervening motion, the vote shall then be taken on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

That Wednesday the 18th instant, after the morning hour, be assigned to the consideration of business reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

This order not to interfere with general appropriation bills or conference reports.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, the Speaker pro tempore declared the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a division.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were—ayes 105, noes 2.

Mr. REED. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair designates the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DOCKERY, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED, to act as tellers during the call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. I ask to be excused.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. BAILEY. I suppose the Clerk has at his desk the bill which is now in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] calls up the bill which the Clerk will read.

The bill (H. R. 4609) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any debtor owing $200 or more shall execute an assignment of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside or be domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 2. That such assignment shall be to a trustee named therein, and shall convey all of the estate of the debtor except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution and liability for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, subject to all valid liens, except with the preference hereinafter allowed. It shall contain a list of the names and residences of all his creditors, and a schedule of his property exempt and unexempt from execution, and the amount due to each creditor. It shall also contain a statement of the liens or other incumbrances upon his property, all of which shall be verified by the oath of the debtor to be correct.

SEC. 3. That such assignment may contain all or any of the following preferences, namely: Debts due the United States or any State in which any of the property of the debtor is situated, or to the servants or laborers of the debtor.

SEC. 4. That any such debtor, after the expiration of four months from the date of the execution of the deed of assignment and the acceptance of the trust by the trustees, may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district in which he resides; or if he be a resident of the District of Columbia, then in the supreme court of the said District; or if he be a resident of a Territory, then in the district court of such Territory of the district in which he resides, asking for a discharge from said debts. The petition shall contain a true copy of the deed of assignment, and shall be verified by the oath of the petitioner.

SEC. 5. That the creditors of the debtor shall be made parties defendant and shall have thirty days' notice of the filing of the same, notice to be given as in suits in the courts of the United States, and shall have thirty days thereafter in which to answer said petition. Upon hearing of the petition if it shall appear that the debtor did make an assignment as authorized by this act, and that the same contained a full and complete conveyance of all his unexempt property, and that after the passage of this act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred in any manner except as authorized by this act, and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor respecting his business or estate to prevent an equal distribution of his estate among his creditors, or to give one creditor an advantage over another, or to defraud his creditors, and that no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill: Provided, however, That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act, the court shall order and adjudge that such debtor be forever discharged from the payment of the debts mentioned and set forth in the petition; and such order and adjudication shall be a full, complete, and final discharge of such debtor from the payment of the said debts: Provided, That no person shall be discharged from any debt or obligation which shall have been created in consequence of a defalcation as a public officer, or as executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, or while acting in any other fiduciary capacity.

SEC. 6. That this act shall continue in force two years and no longer: Provided, That all actions commenced within that time shall not be affected by its expiration, but the same shall be conducted to a conclusion as if said act were in full force and effect.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary were read, as follows:

After the word "assignment," in line 4, of section 1, add the words "or cession."

After the word "be," in line 1, section 2, strike out the words "to a trustee named therein" and insert the words "made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides."

After the word "correct," in line 12, add "the property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act."

In section 5, line 9, strike out the word "after" and insert in lieu thereof "within three months before."

In section 5, line 19, after the word "assignment," add the words "or cession."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REED. Before we go any farther I want to raise the question of consideration on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has decided that question.

Mr. REED. But the ruling heretofore has always been that, notwithstanding a special order, the question of consideration can be raised on the matter of business which comes up under such order. The House may choose not to consider this bill, notwithstanding the special order. Abundant authorities on this subject will be found in the Digest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Can the gentleman from Maine cite any precedent where the question of consideration has been entertained after the House has decided, by special rule under circumstances like the present, to consider a particular bill?

Mr. REED. Numerous decisions will be found in the Digest. I recollect, for instance, a decision of Mr. Speaker Carlisle that, notwithstanding a special order had been adopted for the consideration of a particular matter, the question of consideration could be raised when the matter came up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine, however, will remember that during the occupancy of this seat by Mr. Carlisle no such rule as this was in operation.

Mr. REED. Oh, I understand no such performances as have taken place in this Congress took place under Mr. Carlisle's administration. The Chair is quite right about that. But the analogous proposition—the same principle—was set down. By reference to the Digest it will be seen that—

When a special order has been made setting apart a day for a certain class of business, on the day so set apart the question of consideration can not be raised against the class of business mentioned in the special order. It may be raised, however, against each bill therein embraced as it comes up in its order.

So when a day is set apart for the consideration of a single bill, the question of consideration may on that day be demanded against such bill.

That would seem to cover the case exactly. It does not matter whether it is a day set apart for the consideration of the bill or some other bill.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Maine will permit a suggestion: the rule as adopted fixes the hour of 4:30 o'clock for the time when the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and the question of consideration will consume considerable of the time if now raised. So far as I am concerned, if the gentleman desires to test the sense of the House in regard to the matter, I have no objection to dispensing with the general debate and taking the sense of the House on the question of consideration.

Mr. REED. Does the order fix the hour of 4:30, when the vote is to be taken?

Mr. BAILEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman is mistaken. My recollection of the reading of the order was that it provided one hour of general debate, two hours for debate under the five-minute rule, and at the expiration of that time, whenever it might be, there should be a vote on the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I am informed that I was mistaken as to the hour being fixed. As I had discussed the matter, or as it was indicated to me, the hour of 4:30 was fixed as the time when the debate should close and the vote be taken; that one hour should be devoted to general debate, two hours for debate under the five-minute rule for amendments, and then, at the hour of 4:30 o'clock, the vote was to be taken. I understand no time was fixed when the vote was to be taken. My attention was called away while the rule was being read, and I did not observe that fact. I admit that whatever time is taken up in deciding the question of consideration would not be, under the rule, taken from the time allowed for debate.

Mr. REED. I so understand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Maine does not desire to be heard further.

The Chair does not think the question of consideration can be raised against the bill, inasmuch as the House itself has determined that it shall be considered, and has fixed the method of its consideration. The rule provides that "immediately after the adoption of the resolution the House shall proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 4609) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy." The Chair does not think, therefore, that the question of consideration can be raised under the wording of this rule.

The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

[Mr. BAILEY withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time?

Mr. BAILEY. Ten minutes.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, while I expect to give my support to the bill I can not permit it to pass without calling attention to some very serious objections which suggest themselves to my mind.

I think, sir, that the country not only demands the enactment of a uniform bankruptcy bill which will give unfortunate debtors an opportunity to obtain a release from their debts, but it also demands a bill which will provide a fair, equitable, and honest distribution of the assets of those who may become insolvent. In my judgment this bill does not conform to the latter requirement in any respect whatever.

I call the attention of the House particularly to the latter part of section 5 wherein it is provided:

Upon hearing of the petition if it shall appear that the debtor did make an assignment, as authorized by this act, and that the same contained a full and complete conveyance of all his unexempt property, and that within three months before the passage of this act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred in any manner except as authorized by this act, and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor respecting his business or estate to prevent an equal distribution of his estate among his creditors, or to give one creditor an advantage over another, or to defraud his creditors, and that no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill: Provided, however, That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession and file a petition for discharge, as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act, the court shall order and adjudge that such debtor be forever discharged from the payment of the debts mentioned and set forth in the petition; and such order and adjudication shall be a full, complete, and final discharge of such debtor from the payment of the said debts.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the abuses which I think this bill will immediately call into existence, or rather to existing abuses which will be perpetuated and intensified by its operation. The most usual method by which insolvent debtors defraud their creditors is by collusive court proceedings, the insolvent debtor finding himself unable to pay, having exhausted his credit in all the markets, and obtained all the goods he can, enters into a collusive arrangement with some of the creditors probably, whose claims are in many instances stale or held by relatives or particular friends, to proceed by attachment against him.

Under existing conditions it is almost impossible to successfully oppose those collusive proceedings. The attachment is sustained, the property is sold, the collusion between the debtor and his favored creditors is carried into effect: and the property having been disposed of in this way, the debtor makes an assignment under the laws of his State, and availing himself of the benefits of this act, if it should become a law, obtains a discharge from all his debts.

Mr. BAILEY. The bill expressly provides that where an attachment is sustained he shall not be released. That has escaped the gentleman's attention. I had that difficulty in my mind, and expressly provided against it. If an attachment is sued out, the man is not entitled to the benefit of the law unless he files an assignment or vacates the attachment, so that if his favored creditors get his money he can never get his release.

Mr. BOATNER. The clause of the bill to which I was addressing myself was the latter part of section 4, which mentions among the grounds upon which a discharge will be refused, the fact that any attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill. I find in a proviso—

That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

But, Mr. Speaker, the debtor in the case of collusion stated by me would not file the assignment or the cession until after the attachment had been sustained and the property sold, and sixty days had elapsed; after which time he would make his cession and get his discharge. Of course he would do no act to defeat an attachment that he himself had provoked.

Mr. BAILEY. The provision with reference to the three months was inserted there to prevent men from colluding with their favored creditors three months before the passage of the bill, so that they could not get ready for its passage; and if, within three months from the passage of the bill, up to the time he applies, there has been an attachment levied upon a debtor, he would not be entitled to the benefit of the act at all unless he then filed an assignment and vacated his attachment, so that that is entirely an imaginary difficulty.

Mr. BOATNER. Not at all. Under the provisions of this act the debtor has no right to obtain a discharge from his debt, if an attachment has been levied upon his property within three months before the passage of this bill. Now, will that delay of three months continue so as to operate as a bar to a cession, if he has been attached at any time within three months prior to the cession? I think not, because the attachments that are referred to here are attachments which have been taken out within three months preceding the day when this bill becomes a law.

But the gentleman does not get my point. It is this: There is nothing in this bill which will prevent any debtor from applying for a discharge after attachment proceedings have been taken against him and sustained, if a delay of three months elapses between the attachment and the assignment. There is nothing in the act that denies the benefit of the act after this delay expires, and therefore I insist the door is thrown wide open for collusive proceedings, by which, under the form of law, property may be transferred to the hands of favored creditors, who may hold in trust for the debtor, who, after these proceedings have been consummated and the estate practically disposed of, will make an assignment or cession. If he has no property he only needs to declare that fact under most of the laws, and after notice to his creditors, obtain a discharge from all his debts. Then he practically has got his property in the hands of trustees, and obtained a discharge from his debts.

I call attention, Mr. Speaker, to these difficulties which present themselves to my mind. I think they are grave and serious. I think that when we are enacting a bankruptcy law we should make one which would not only put it in the power of the debtor to make a surrender of his property at any time and be discharged from his debts, but which would put it in the power of the creditor, in cases of unquestioned or confessed insolvency to apply the same remedy, and that when property of a bankrupt is surrendered it should be placed in the hands of trustees who will act in the interest of the creditors and fairly distribute it under general and uniform rules prescribed by the Federal statutes. That is my opinion of the kind of a bankruptcy law we should have. As we can not get that, this is the next best thing, and I am ready to support it. It will confer very great advantages upon the debtor class, and as by its terms it is only to run for two years, the objections to which I call attention are not insuperable.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that, for the consideration of a bankruptcy bill, which directly and indirectly affects every citizen of the United States, and directly concerns every business man in every relation of life, only one hour should have been given for general debate.

The members of this House will note the minority report presented to this House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON], which presents the objections to this bill as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. That report is able and exhaustive and presents ample and unanswerable arguments against this bill, and if there is no objection I shall print some portions of that report as a part of my remarks.

It says:

The minority of the Committee on the Judiciary respectfully dissent from the report of the committee, and submit herewith their principal reasons therefor, as follows:

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE TORREY BANKRUPTCY BILL AND THE BAILEY BILL.

The Bailey bill (H. R. 4609) is an incomplete measure which contains imperfect provisions for voluntary bankruptcy; the Torrey bankruptcy bill (H. R. 4617) is a complete measure which contains comprehensive provisions for voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy.

The incomplete bill (the Bailey bill) may not be, but the complete bill (the Torrey bankruptcy bill) is, constitutional.

The incomplete bill would be an experiment in bankruptcy legislation in this country; the complete bill embodies the wisdom and avoids the errors of past legislation in this and other countries.

The incomplete bill may not prove to be, but the complete bill is, unquestionably, a bankruptcy bill.

The incomplete bill may not apply to the whole country; it might be, in effect, repealed, and reënacted from time to time by State and Territorial legislative acts or decisions by their courts: the complete bill applies to the whole country and can not be affected, except by an act of Congress.

The incomplete bill does not grant any relief to debtors who owe less than $200: the complete bill grants relief to debtors without invidious distinctions as to amounts owed.

The incomplete bill leaves it discretionary with debtors to provide for the payment in full of the wages of servants and laborers in the States where they are not provided for by the insolvent laws; the complete bill makes absolute provision for the payment of the wages of employés of every grade for a reasonable time prior to bankruptcy, and for a liberal amount, and will apply alike in all of the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia.

The incomplete bill requires an assignment to be made by the debtor according to the laws of the State where he lives, and also according to its provisions, although they may be in conflict; it also requires that the trust shall be accepted by bil trustee before an application for a discharge can be made; the complete dil permits the bankrupt to make his application to the Federal court for a discharge, irrespective of conflicts between State laws and the Federal law and without reference to the acts of the trustee.

The incomplete bill, permits applications for discharges to be made without limit of timeor number, after the expiration of four months after the date of the assignment while it is in force; the complete bill permits the application to be made after the expiration of two, and within the next four months, or conditionally within the next six months, but not afterwards.

The incomplete bill makes it possible for discharges to be improperly granted, or withheld without reason; the complete bill embodies such safeguards as are calculated to enable all honest insolvent debtors to receive discharges, and to prevent all dishonest debtors receiving them.

The incomplete bill permits corporations, including national banks, to be discharged; the complete bill does not seek to interfere with the rights of creditors to pursue their remedies against the stockholders of corporations, and hence withholds the right of discharge.

The incomplete bill will permit the discharge of dishonest debtors, except those who make an assignment within three months before its passage; the complete bill provides for the discharge of only such debtors as are honest and ought to receive this great consideration under the law without reference to the time they become bankrupt.

The incomplete as well as the complete bill forbids the discharge of a person from any debt created by a defalcation while acting as a public officer, an executor, guardian, or trustee, or in any fiduciary capacity; but the incomplete bill permits the discharge of a corporation, although it may have plundered the estate of which it was executor or administrator, robbed a child of which it was guardian, misappropriated the funds received as a trustee or in some other fiduciary capacity.

The incomplete bill neither leaves the administration of the estates of unfortunates to be wholly dealt with by the State insolvent laws in their diverse ways, nor to a national-bankruptcy law in a comprehensive way; the complete bill is a national law and vests jurisdiction to administer it for the benefit of debtors and creditors in the Federal courts.

The incomplete bill requires proceedings to be had, first, under a State law, and, second, under a Federal law; the complete bill provides for proceedings only under a Federal law.

The incomplete bill provides that property shall be assigned and administered by a State law, subject to the provisions of this Federal law; it also provides that where property in different States is assigned it shall be according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides; the complete bill leaves no room for unfortunate conflicts between State and Federal laws and the laws of different States, to be fought out at the expense of our citizens who may honestly endeavor to exercise a constitutional right.

The incomplete bill requires that the costs of two courts shall be incurred; the complete bill provides for economical proceedings in only one court.

The incomplete bill will expire in two years; the complete bill will protect the rights of debtors and creditors without limit of time.

The incomplete bill extends the benefits of voluntary bankruptcy, in the States and Territories where it applies, to corporations, including national banks; the complete bill does not permit corporations to become voluntary bankrupts, but extends to them, except national banks, the benefits of involuntary bankruptcy.

The incomplete bill is an imperfect reproduction of the law of the "Poor English Gentleman;" the complete bill embodies all that is wise and conservative in the English bankruptcy act of to-day.

The incomplete bill is alleged to be in the interest of debtors; the complete bill recognizes the fact that all debtors are not poor, nor all creditors rich, and therefore protects the interests of both classes alike, without reference to their poverty or their wealth.

The incomplete bill is calculated to destroy credit and thereby require a great majority of those who buy property or borrow money, especially in a small way, to give good security in the form of collateral, indorsements, or mortgages, for their indebtedness; the complete bill will extend credit by securing an equitable enforcement of the rights of both the debtors and creditors, and will have a tendency to enable would-be debtors to buy property and borrow money without security, since under it preferences will not be given and the equitable rights of creditors will be secured.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, demanded in the best interests of honest debtors.

The incomplete bill might, but the complete bill would not, advance the interests of dishonest debtors.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, demanded in the best interests of both debtors and creditors.

The incomplete bill, or a purely involuntary bankruptcy bill, would not, but the complete bill would, protect the best interests alike of poor and rich creditors.

The incomplete bill would not, but the complete bill would, protect and promote the interests of consumers.

The incomplete bill is not demanded by any organization or by any man outside of Congress, so far as we know or have heard; its enactment is not advocated by any newspaper, so far as we have been advised; the complete bill has been demanded by organizations of all sorts, petitioners of every class, and very generally by the press in all parts of the country.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, advocated in the best interests of all classes of people.

The incomplete bill is not, but the complete bill is, supported by the members of Congress who are in favor of securing to all of the people every right guaranteed by the Constitution.

The incomplete bill was voted down in the Fifty-first Congress in the House; the complete bill was passed at the same time by a large nonpolitical, nonsectional majority.

The incomplete bill was adversely reported by this committee in the Fifty-second Congress: the complete bill, at the same time, was reported by this committee as a comprehensive embodiment of the legislation anticipated by the Constitution.

When the debate on the Torrey bankruptcy bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary began, the reading of the bill by the Clerk to the members was postponed upon the suggestion of a member from Texas until it should be considered under the five-minute rule; before that time a member from Missouri, Mr. BLAND, moved to strike out the enacting clause, and the motion prevailed. In the debate upon that motion it was stated, and not contradicted, that two-thirds of the members had not read the bill. We therefore respectfully submit that this subject has not been considered by the members of the House.

The complete bill is the one the enacting clause of which was stricken out, with a few amendments suggested in the course of the general debate as calculated to improve it.

The fact that the incomplete bill was reintroduced by the leader of the opposition, Mr. BAILEY, and its prompt report to the House secured by those who have heretofore been classed as opponents to bankruptcy legislation, immediately after Mr. BLAND'S motion was made and carried, at an unexpected time to its friends, is an admission that bankruptcy legislation is demanded by the people. Since this demand is to be answered, the only question is, will Congress pass the incomplete or the complete bill? When the members of the House shall have considered the subject fully we have no doubt but that their conclusion will be a wise one, and that the complete bill will be adopted as a substitute and then passed.

IS THE BAILEY BILL CONSTITUTIONAL?

Out of deference to the views of the members of the committee who have reported the Bailey bill to the House, we will not express an opinion as to whether it is or is not constitutional; we will, however, submit some questions which each member may answer for himself; if the answer to any of these questions, or any one of others equally pertinent, shall be adverse to the bill, such answer will show it to be unconstitutional; the fact that these questions are pertinent certainly shows that the bill is impractical and ought not to be passed in preference to one which is free from these objections.

By the first section of the Bailey bill it is provided—

"That if any debtor * * * shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside or be domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for."

By the second section it is provided—

"That such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides."

Does this bill, by its above provisions, undertake to say how assignments under State laws shall be made? If so, it provides for a condition of things which may be illustrated thus: Mr. BAILEY resides in Texas; if he has property there and also in Mississippi and should wish to make an assignment under the first section of his bill, the one in Texas would have to conform to the laws of that State, and also "with the requirements of this act;" the one in Mississippi would have to conform to the laws of that State, and also "with the requirements of this act."

If he should wish to make an assignment under the second section of his bill, the assignment in Mississippi would have to be "made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides," i. e., in accordance to the laws of Texas. Would a national law which required an assignment to be made of property in any given State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in accordance with State or Territorial laws other than its own, be constitutional?

If it should be claimed that the above provisions are not for the purpose of overriding the State, Territorial, or District of Columbia laws, but that they simply state conditions which must be complied with by a debtor before he can get a discharge, then our question is, can a debtor having property in more than one State, or Territory, or the District of Columbia and a State or Territory, get a discharge under this bill? If not, is it not unconstitutional for want of uniformity?

By the second section it is also provided:

"The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act."

Take again the example of Mr. BAILEY; let us waive the question, as it is a difficult one, as to how he is to assign his property in Mississippi, and consider the question of its administration, both in that and his own State. Does this provision require the State of Texas to administer estates assigned under its laws "subject to the provisions of this act?" We have always thought that when a State Legislature, while in the exercise of its constitutional authority, passed a law, that the courts of that State might enforce it without reference to the "provisions of an act" of any other legislative body on earth!

Does the above provision require the assigned estate, in the example given, to be administered by the courts of Mississippi "according to the laws of the State" of Texas and "subject to the provisions of this act?" The language used is, "shall be administered," etc. If such are its requirements is it constitutional? It can not be said that it constitutes simply a condition precedent to a discharge, because, upon a hearing under a petiion for a discharge, it is not required that any showing should be made as to the administration of the estate.

By the second section it is also provided:

"That such assignment * * * shall convey all of the estate of the debtor, except, etc., * * * and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, subject, etc., * * * It shall contain a list, etc., * * * a schedule, etc., * * * a statement of liens, etc., * * * all of which shall be verified," etc. * * *

This bill does not purport to provide for any proceedings in a United States court in which the question of bankruptcy shall be determined, by which the rights of creditors shall be adjudged, or by which the assets shall be marshaled and distributed. Can these provisions, therefore, have any force which relates simply to the effect and provisions of the assignment under State laws?

It would be competent for such a law to embrace a comprehensive bankruptcy system, i. e., to provide, first, for the determination of the jurisdictional fact as to whether a given debtor was or was not a bankrupt; second, for the administration of the estates of bankrupts (not simply of debtors); third, the discharge of the bankrupt (not for the discharge of a debtor who might, or might not, be a bankrupt); fourth, the adjudication of the rights of creditors; and, fifth, the punishment of those who have committed frauds.

In the event of such a law, embracing such a system, it might properly provide for an injunction against proceedings in the State courts which were in conflict with it. But since it does not so provide, will any restrictions which it may apply, first, as to what the State courts shall do, and, second, as to how they shall do it, have any binding force upon such courts? Is it not, therefore, unconstitutional for this reason?

Section 5 contains a provision with reference to what debtors the court may discharge, as follows:

"That the debtor did make an assignment * * * and that no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill: Provided, however, That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession and file a petition for a discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act."

The primary purpose of this bill is to provide for the granting of discharges, and yet it is here provided how a debtor may "vacate the levy of" a State attachment, otherwise than by paying the demand or giving bond; would a State court which had issued an attachment, and a State officer who had executed it, pay any attention to such a provision in a United States law? Ought they to do so?

We will consider for a moment, only for a moment, that this bill may properly provide that an attempt of the defendant to assign the title to the property which has been attached and the filing of an application for a discharge in the United States court will vacate the levy of a State attachment. We take this view simply to enable us to consider an additional defect in this provision. Suppose that within the time provided the debtor makes the assignment or cession, but the property shall have already sold under an attachment prior to his making such application, or prior to his making such assignment or cession, and the proceeds of such a sale have been paid over to satisfy the demands of the attaching creditors.

The effect, in such an event, could not be to "vacate the levy of such attachment." Could the creditors who had not attached enforce this provision? Would the debtor be entitled to file his application for a discharge? Suppose that his attempt to assign the property as herein provided should be ignored by the State court issuing the attachment and its officer levying it, could the debtor then file his petition for a discharge? Is there anyone who will claim that such a provision is constitutional?

In brief, is not this bill unconstitutional because of what it contains and what it does not contain?

As between a bill concerning which, if enacted, there would be at least a reasonable doubt as to its constitutionality and one concerning which no such doubt exists we are in favor of the latter

IS THE BAILEY BILL A BANKRUPTCY BILL?

Does the measure of Mr. BAILEY constitute more than an attempt to meddle with the State courts in their endeavor, under imperfect insolvency laws, to exercise the jurisdiction which was reserved to Congress by the Constitution? Is it anything more than an endeavor to pay, by the judgment of a court, the debts of debtors who never have been adjudged, and may not be, bankrupts?

Can a law under which there can not be any bankrupts be said to be a bankrupt law?

This bill does not purport, by its terms—

"To establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," as provided by the Constitution. Its language is as follows:

"A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy."

Even if the title conformed to the language of the Constitution, it would not make it a bankruptcy bill. You can not make a signboard into a house by posting a notice upon it, "This is a house."

"Laws on the subject of bankruptcies" had well defined characteristics when that provision was inserted in the Constitution. It follows that any bill which it is proposed to enact, under the power given to Congress by the Constitution, must have those characteristics or else there is no power to enact it. Those characteristics were that there should be an adjudication in bankruptcy; an identification of the creditors and an adjudication of their rights; the discharge of, or refusal to discharge the bankrupt if he filed a petition therefor; an administration of the estate; and the punishment of those who had committed frauds.

The first step is to give the debtor a status which will vest the court with jurisdiction of him and of his estate; suppose that in an involuntary proceeding in bankruptcy, under a bankrupt law, it should be found that an act of bankruptcy had not been committed; the result would be that the court would not have jurisdiction and the case would be dismissed. If, upon a hearing for the discharge of a voluntary bankrupt, under a bankrupt law, it should appear that he had never filed a petition in bankruptcy, it would follow that he had never become a bankrupt, and therefore the court never had jurisdiction of him and his application for a discharge would have to be dismissed.

In other words, a bankruptcy court can never have jurisdiction of anyone except a bankrupt; when such jurisdiction is acquired it extends to the rights of the creditors, the rights of the bankrupt, the administration of the estate, and the protection of the creditors, the bankrupt, and the estate, by the punishment of those who have committed frauds.

Under the Bailey bill the debtor is required only to make an assignment, secure its acceptance by the trustee therein named, and apply for a discharge. It is not necessary that the assignment shall have been filed or that his status shall have been fixed by the decree of any court. It can not, therefore, be said that he is a bankrupt. As the debtor does not become a bankrupt the bill can not be a bankrupt bill.

Mr. BAILEY in his report makes an admission as to the character of his bill as follows:

"This bill not only differs from all previous enactments in being purely voluntary, but another and material difference is that under it the property is administered according to State laws."

Can a law which "differs from all previous enactments" be established under the Constitution?

We hasten to explain, in view of the failure of the bill reported to have any of the characteristics of a bankruptcy law, that it was reported in the absence of three members of the committee on the day after it was introduced, and that there was a feeling that the House would decide the question, and that it was desirable to get the subject up again for consideration without delay.

In view of the characteristics of the bankruptcy law provided for in the Constitution, formulated and unanimously adopted by George Washington and his associates, what is the bill by Mr. BAILEY and his associates? It is unknown to the Constitution; it has no parallel in past legislation; it is a stranger to us, and we can not, therefore, give it a name. We advocate a bill which, when read to or by the members, will be found to contain each one of those characteristics, expressed in plain and simple language. We therefore think that it ought to be adopted as a substitute and then passed.

WILL THE BAILEY BILL APPLY TO THE DEBTORS OF THE WHOLE COUNTRY?

The language of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power to pass such a bill as the one in question is as follows:

"To establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

We are in favor of carrying into effect this provision of the Constitution by the enactment of a perfectly fair and impartial law, as understood by our constitutional fathers.

The first section of the Bailey bill provides as follows:

"That if any debtor * * * shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, etc., * * * it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for."

The Legislature of Montana never has passed an assignment law. It has relied upon Congress to pass a bankruptcy law. Will the effect of the measure proposed be, if enacted, to deny any relief to the debtors of that State? Why should we pass such a law when we may as well pass one which is comprehensive of the rights of both debtors and creditors "throughout the United States," as provided by the Constitution?

We have not had time to examine the statutes of all of the States; there may be others which have no laws upon the subject. If so, their citizens may, under this proprosed law, be denied their constitutional rights.

This law will result where it applies, if enacted, in a diverse administration of the estates of bankrupts in the States and Territories and the District of Columbia. Can it, therefore, be said to be "uniform throughout the United States"?

The citizens of all of the States which now have such laws may be denied their constitutional rights, as citizens of the United States, by their supreme court deciding that such laws were for some reason void, or by the repealing of such laws by their Legislature. This proposed law may be, in effect, enacted or repealed again and again by legislative action thereon and without any action by Congress.

This proposed law does not of and within itself confer any right upon a citizen; the right which it purports to confer is wholly dependent upon the action heretofore or hereafter of a State or Territorial Legislature or by Congress with reference to the District of Columbia.

Why should our constitutional rights as citizens of the United States be thus denied us, or be jeopardized by the possible action of our courts or Legislatures, since they act wholly as to our rights as citizens of the State?

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we were a national body, composed of representatives from the whole country? We think not.

The first section provides as follows:

"That if any debtor * * * shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, etc., * * * in which he may reside or be domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act." * * *

The above provision is contradicted by one from the second section, as follows:

"That such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides."

The second section also provides as follows:

"The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act."

The debtor having property in two States can never make an assignment according to both of the above provisions and therefore can not, as it seems to us, have the benefits of the act.

The debtor having property in two States can never secure the administration of that part of it which is situated in a State other than that of his domicile according to any laws other than those of the States in which the property is situated; the provisions of this act, therefore, can never be complied with in that respect. In view of these provisions what must be said concerning the uniformity of this bill "throughout the United States?" Possibly the explanation is to be found in the title to the bill; it is not, by its terms, to establish uniform laws "throughout the United States," as required by the Constitution, but only "to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy."

Upon a consideration of the whole subject it seems to us that we must reach the conclusion that the enactment of such a law would not be a full exercise of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution to legislate upon this subject.

Such are the provisions of the bill reported favorably, the next day after being introduced, by a committee of lawyers of which we are members!

SMALL DEBTORS MUST, BUT LARGE ONES NEED NOT, PAY.

Section 1 of the Bailey bill provides that it shall apply only to persons who owe $300 or more. Why should this financial limitation be put upon voluntary bankruptcy? The man who owes less than this sum may be as effectually borne down by it as the man who owes a greater sum. The probabilities are that he will be less able to pay it than the man who has succeeded in owing a larger amount. Why should a rule be established that a debtor who owes amounts up to $300 must pay, or continue to owe them, but the debtor who owes a larger sum may secure a discharge without the payment of any sum? We contend that all citizens should be equal before the law.

Can it be possible that the members of the Committee on the Judiciary wish to recommend to the House that it shall draw this kind of a distinction between citizens who have large financial obligations and those who have small ones?

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we earnestly wish to legislate wisely for the equal benefit of all classes of the people? We think not.

The complete bill extends the benefits of voluntary bankruptcy to all debtors, except corporations, without invidious distinctions as to amounts owed. It provides that creditors holding unsecured claims for $500 or over against a common debtor may commence proceedings for themselves and such other creditors as may wish to join them. This provision was made as to involuntary bankruptcy because it was thought that a substantial benefit would not accrue to creditors by permitting them to proceed in cases where the indebtedness was less than that sum.

We do not want in this country any distinction between citizens under the laws because of their occupation, or because they are rich or because they are poor. We want if possible for an honest man, irrespective of the amount he owes, to make a voluntary surrender of his property, except his exemptions, and, if honest, secure a discharge; but we do not want it to be possible for a rich man to hide away his property and then go into bankruptcy and secure a discharge from his debts which he could and ought to pay; we do not want it possible for poor men to become rich by such means.

If a debtor has become insolvent and can not meet his obligations and protect his property we think his creditors ought to be entitled to proceed, under very careful restrictions, to secure the payment of at least a percentage of their claims, since it is the same to them in dollars and cents whether the loss they suffer grows out of dishonesty, incompetency, or the misfortune of their debtor. We want it to be possible for the creditors of a debtor who has swindled his creditors, or is preparing to swindle them, to be able to interfere by involuntary proceedings and secure their equitable rights.

The bill we offer as a substitute for the Bailey bill will apply, approximately, to the affairs of only one in a hundred of those who do business or conduct agricultural, mineral, or other industries in whole or in part on credit; it will affect the affairs of those to whom it does apply with impartiality, and therefore ought to be passed.

THE PROTECTION OF SERVANTS AND LABORERS INCOMPLETE.

The third section of the Bailey bill provides that there may be preferences for—

"Debts due the United States or any State in which any of the property of the debtor is situated, or to the servants or laborers of the debtor."

This provision leaves it discretionary to the debtor as to whether he will or will not provide for his servants or laborers, unless there is such a provision in the State law. We think that any bill on this subject should provide that servants and laborers should have a preferred claim for their wages. Eight of the States, as shown by a published table, do not make any provision under their assignment laws for the protection of servants and laborers. Such States and Territories as have enacted such laws might repeal them.

Would the passage of this bill indicate what we know of the daily necessities of laborers and of the wise public policy which justifies the payment to them when their employer fails of their wages for a limited time before such failure and in a reasonable amount? We think not.

The bill which we submit as a substitute makes provision for the payment of the wages of servants and laborers earned within a reasonable time, before the date of the failure of the employer, and for a liberal amount, without reference to whether the States have or have not done so. It thereby not only secures the rights of those in the States where they would be neglected under the provisions of the Bailey bill, and in all of the other States where they might be so neglected by the repeal of present laws, but it establishes a uniform rule under which the rights of servants and laborers of the whole country will be protected.

The wages of employés should be paid, because it will promote alike the best interests of debtors and other creditors. The great body of laborers live from day to day on their daily earnings. If they were compelled, in the event of the failure of their employer, to take a percentage of their wages in common with other creditors, as they might have to in eight of the States under the Bailey bill, it would result in untold hardships to them and their families. The possibilities of having such calamities befall them would result in their having always to be on the alert with reference to the financial standing and moral worth of their employers. Whenever it happened that they knew that their employers were about to fail, or thought there was danger, or heard a rumor, or became frightened, with or without cause, they, or many of them at least, would be compelled in financial self-defense to quit their employment.

Such a result might possibly be secured by the circulation of a malicious rumor as to the solvency or fraudulent acts of an employer. The abandonment by employés of their employment at a critical time might ruin financially a solvent, honest employer. Such an abandonment might result in irreparable damage to the property of an employer who had become insolvent, and thereby result in great injury to the property interests of the creditors.

The bill we offer as a substitute is not liable to these objections, and hence ought to be passed in the best interest of employés, as well as other creditors, and of debtors.

IMPERFECT AS TO DISCHARGES.

The fourth section of the Bailey bill provides that—

"Such debtor, after the expiration of four months from the date of the execution of the deed of assignment and the acceptance of the trust by the trustees, may file his petition * * * asking for a discharge from said debts."

Suppose the trustee should not accept the trust. In that event the debtor might not be able to file his application for a discharge; at any rate he might be denied what ought to be his right, or hampered and delayed in securing it, by the whim or caprice of a trustee. There is no pertinent relationship between the right to file an application for a discharge and the acceptance by the trustee, and the bill ought not to make the one dependant upon the other.

This bill provides how property shall be assigned, surrendered, and administered. There are now in the country many hundreds of thousands of honest debtors who ought to be discharged under any law which may be passed, but who have no property to assign, surrender, or to have administered; will this bill apply to this army of men? If it will, why should they be put to the trouble of making an assignment under a State law only to go with a copy of it to a United States court and begin another proceeding?

This bill provides that a debtor can not apply for a discharge in a United States court until after making an assignment under a State law. Great numbers of unfortunate men have been compelled to make assignments under the imperfect State insolvency laws during the many years that Congress has refused to pass a wise bankruptcy law; their estates have been administered and they are now penniless. Many of the States have passed insolvency laws under which creditors may cause the estates of their debtors to be liquidated. Many, many men have seen their estates thus disposed of, and are now waiting for relief under a national law. Will this bill apply to these different classes of unfortunate men? If so, why should it not permit them to apply directly to a United States court? Why require first the making of a needless assignment of nothing in a State court?

The creditors of many dishonest debtors have sued them for their debts, litigated with each other for preferences, and paid the costs and expenses. Sometimes they have recovered some part of their claims, sometimes they have lost everything in addition to their costs and expenses, and frequently debtors have escaped with the goods and money.

It is proposed by this bill that such creditors shall lose the residue of their claims against their debtors unless they go to the further expense of, first, contending with the personal representative (the assignee) of the debtor in a State court; and, second, defending in a Federal court an application for a discharge, which must be granted even to dishonest applicants, unless it happens that their assignment was made within three months before the passage of the bill.

Debtors and creditors have always found that diverse laws and complicated proceedings aid rascals, cause needless and exorbitant costs, and hamper and disgust honest men.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we were familiar with past legislation upon this subject? We think not.

The complete bill will be found, when it shall have been read to or by the members, to contain plain and simple provisions by which every deserving bankrupt may, in an inexpensive way, secure a discharge. It will be found to contain also safeguards to prevent rascals extorting from a court of justice a certificate of discharge, which will constitute a fraud against small and large creditors. We therefore recommend it as a substitute

NO LIMITATION OF TIME AS TO APPLICATIONS FOR DISCHARGES.

Section 4 of the Bailey bill provides:

"That any such debtor, after the expiration of four months from the date of the execution of the deed of assignment, * * * may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district in which he resides * * * asking for a discharge from said debts."

The fraudulent debtor—an individual or corporation—who ought not to be discharged by any law enacted by honest men for honest people may, under this bill, file his or its application at any time while the law is in force subsequent to the expiration of four months.

Thus he or it may abide his or its time and then proceed with perjured testimony to exact from a court of justice, in the absence of the dead and indifferent creditors, a certificate which will constitute a fraud upon his or its creditors and enable him or it thereafter to enjoy the same benefits as those bankrupts who have become such through no fault of their own and who have been given a discharge upon the merits of their cases.

It is not required that the application shall be made in the United States district court having the same territorial jurisdiction, or partly so, as the court in which the assignment was made; the provision simply is that it shall be made "in the district court of the United States in which he resides."

If, for example, the assignment was made in Mr. BAILEY's district, and the conduct of the debtor has been so reprehensible as to prevent the probability of his securing a discharge in the United States court of that district, he may move to California or to any other district within the country and there again apply for a discharge; if the discharge should not be granted, the petition will be dismissed, and will, of course, not constitute any bar to a removal to Maine or some other district and the renewal of the petition, until in the end a certificate of discharge shall have been exacted from a court of justice.

The bill we advocate provides that the application shall not be made within two months after the adjudication, that it may be made to the court in which the proceedings are pending within the next four months, or, if it can not be made within that time, the judge may permit it to be made within the next six months, but it shall not be made thereafter. The purpose of this provision is to have the matter disposed of within a reasonable time, to the end that all parties in interest shall have an opportunity to be heard and that justice may be done.

The discharge of honest insolvents who have failed, through no avoidable fault of their own, is justified by a wise public policy. They can not, while resting under the burden of their debts, either pay them, discharge their full obligations to their dependents, or fulfill the greatest possibilities as citizens in the communities in which they live. It was intended by the founders of the Government that these men should be discharged. We are ready to make good such intention, by the passage of a law pursuant to which they may be discharged under such careful restrictions as will prevent bad men slipping through at the same time; we therefore urge the passage of the complete bill.

A DISCHARGE MAY BE IMPROPERLY GRANTED OR WITHHELD.

Section 5 of the Bailey bill provides, among a lot of other things, that;

"Upon hearing of the petition if it shall appear that the debtor did make an assignment as authorized by this act." * * *

There is no limitation as to the number of assignments which he may have made; if, therefore, the first assignment does not conform to the provisions of the bill, it seems to us that he may subsequently, at his convenience and under the circumstances which are thought to be entirely compatible with his interest, proceed to make another assignment, and then force through his discharge.

There are certain limitations as to acts which might prevent the granting of a discharge if consummated "within three months before the passage of this act," but there is no limitation or inhibition against the same class of fraudulent acts if they shall have been committed prior to such three months, or if they shall be committed after the act has gone into effect.

It is provided by section 5, among other things which a petitioner must show upon a hearing for his discharge, as follows:

"That no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor within three months before the passage of this bill: Provided, however, That if, within four months after the levy of an attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment, and such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act." * * *

We do not comprehend why the simple fact of an attachment having been levied against a debtor "within three months before the passage of this bill" should, of itself, bar him from the right of receiving a discharge; the language is that the attachment has been "levied."

Many innocent men have their property wrongfully levied upon, and in the end the attachment is quashed. Why should the men who have been thus unfortunately attached, within three months before the passage of this bill, have any different rights than the same class of men who may happen to have been attached either before or subsequent to that period? The making of an assignment and applying for a discharge will not enable such debtor to receive a discharge. The reason that it will not do so is that "the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition" will not "vacate the levy of such attachment." The time never will come, therefore, when "such debtor shall be then entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act."

This bill proposes to divide all time into three periods: First, the three months before its passage; second, the infinity of time before such three months; and third, the two years during which it is to be in force. It provides that the rights of those who may apply for a discharge shall be determined, not with reference strictly and only to whether such acts as they have committed were right or wrong, but especially with reference to whether they were committed within a particular one of these three periods

We do not know any reason why any such distinction as this should be made. The bill we advocate does not make any such distinction.

The method proposed of making proof under an application of a bankrupt for a discharge is an unheard-of departure from the ordinary proceedings in courts of justice in this, that it not only requires the applicant to prove that he has done certain things, but that he has not done others, i. e., he must prove himself innocent. A bankruptcy bill should provide, in our judgment, with reference to a discharge so far as the applicant is concerned, that he has become a bankrupt by a decree of court, that he has filed his application within the time limited by the act, and conclude with a prayer for his discharge.

It should then be the right of those who are in interest to oppose the discharge to show, as an affirmative proposition, that he has done any one or more of the acts the doing of which, according to the terms of the bill, would prevent his receiving that great privilege. Such are the provisions of the bill we advocate as a substitute for this one.

CERTAIN DEBTORS OUGHT NOT TO BE, BUT WILL BE, DISCHARGED.

The fifth section of the Bailey bill provides that a discharge shall be granted if upon a hearing of the petition, it shall appear as follows:

"That the debtor did make an assignment as authorized by this act, * * * and that within three months before the passage of this act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred in any manner except as authorized by this act, and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor respecting his business or estate to prevent an equal distribution of his estate among his creditors, or to give one creditor an advantage over another, or to defraud his creditors, and that no attachment has been levied. * * * Provided, That no person shall be discharged from any debt or obligation which shall have been created * * * in any other fiduciary capacity."

Persons will not be discharged as to debts which may have been incurred in a fiduciary capacity, but there is no limitation as to the discharge of corporations; they may deliberately prepare for and make an assignment in certain parts of the country, except within three months before the passage of this bill, and afterwards secure their discharge without let or hindrance. Do the members of this committee, not joining herein, wish to maintain that position in the House?

There are now in the country large numbers of trust companies which become executors and administrators of the estates of the dead, guardians of the estates of children, and trustees of sacred funds of all sorts, and otherwise act in fiduciary capacities; there is no prohibition in this bill against their securing a discharge from debts created by their embezzling such funds; it prohibits a person from securing a discharge under exactly the same conditions. Why this distinction between corporations and persons?

There is now a national law for the government of national banks, which is more rigid and under which they can be better managed than under any bankruptcy law. Do the members of this committee, who join in recommending the Bailey bill to the House, wish to be understood as desiring to have national banks secure discharges in bankruptcy and go on in business?

All debtors, except such as shall have made an assignment within three months before the passage of the bill, are to be discharged; not simply the honest debtors who have surrendered their property over and above their exemptions, but also the fraudulent debtors, of every degree of vileness and degradation; the insolvent railroads, the bursted banks, the rotten insurance companies, and everybody else—all are to be discharged; not only those who can not pay, but those who can but will not pay, are to have their debts, in effect, paid by the judgment of a court of equity! There is an exception to the above statement; it is that persons who become indebted as the result of misappropriating money or property in a fiduciary capacity can not be discharged; but this prohibition does not apply to corporations; they may plunder estates in their charge, rob children of whose estates they are curators, and embezzle funds received as trustees, and still be discharged under the incomplete bill.

The fact that honest men want a good law established throughout the United States, which shall grant relief to honest insolvent debtors and protect honest creditors in their rights, is made a pretext for considering a bill under which all debtors, except those making an assignment within a particular three months, may be discharged and the rascals who profit by fraud may go unwhipped of justice. Why encourage fraud and dishonesty by the passage of this bill, when by the passage of a complete law we can diminish it?

It may be all right in the estimation of some persons, for parties residing in obscure places to secure discharges from their debts, due to people who are supposed to be rich; we do not believe that the honest people of any part of the country want such an opportunity. How will it be to have live stock and agricultural products sent to market, and have those who are intrusted with their sale secure the proceeds and then make an assignment, and subsequently secure a discharge as provided by this bill? Will the gentlemen who advocate this bill undertake to maintain that it would be right to pass a measure under which such wrongs, or kindred ones, might be perpetrated?

We are in favor of the discharge of voluntary and involuntary bankrupts under such careful restrictions as will prevent dishonest men taking advantage of the law.

Would the passage of the Bailey bill indicate an earnest endeavor on our part to protect the weak and the honest against the strong and the dishonest and enforce the rule of "do unto others as you would that others should do unto you"? We think not.

The enactment of a voluntary law will subject the people to the greatest dangers incident to such legislation, and secure for them only the minimum of good; the enactment of a voluntary and involuntary law would subject them only to the minimum of danger and secure for them the maximum of good. We are, therefore, in favor of defeating the incomplete and passing the complete bill.

JURISDICTION TO BE EXERCISED BY BOTH STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

The Federal Constitution not only reserved to Congress the power to establish "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," but prohibited the States from impairing the obligations of contracts. The result is that Congress can, and the States can not, enact a comprehensive bankrupt law.

The Constitution did not give the right to Congress to require the State courts to enforce its laws, but it did provide for Federal courts, and gave Congress the power to so perfect them as to make ample provisions for the administration of the Federal laws. We could not if we would compel the State courts to administer our laws; we ought not to do so if we could. It is the right of the people to have a wise and complete law enacted upon the subject of bankruptcy. It is their right to have it enforced in the courts upon which we can confer jurisdiction, and from which appeals will lie to the Supreme Court, to the end that a uniformity of construction and practice may be secured.

It would not be right, even if it were possible, as it is not, for us to require the States to pay judges and maintain courts to enforce national laws.

Why require an assignment in a State court as a condition-precedent to applying for a discharge in a United States court when the prospective bankrupt has no property to assign?

Why require parties in interest to pay the expenses of proceedings in two courts when by a complete law we can provide for the costs of only one of them?

Congress has been legislating ever since it was first organized, but has never yet passed a law making it necessary for a United States citizen, in order to secure his constitutional rights under a United States law in a United States court, to first begin proceedings under a State law; we do not believe Congress will make any such departure by passing this bill.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we know that the State governments are different from the Federal Government, and why is it so? That each has its own trial courts to administer its own laws and pays the expenses of maintaining them, and why is it so? That each has a single appellate court to correct the errors of such trial courts, and why it is so? We think not.

We advocate two things: First, the passage of a law contemplated by the Constitution and founded upon precedent, rather than one which will constitute an experiment—possibly a disastrous one; and, second, the postponement of the Bailey bill until its friends submit a constitutional amendment and secure its passage and ratification, if they can, giving a joint jurisdiction to State and Federal courts of laws passed by Congress, so that there will be no question as to our power to pass this kind of a State national law.

Can it be said that this proposed law will tend to "promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty," for which the Constitution was ordained and established? If not, let us pass one which will do so.

A CONFLICT BETWEEN STATE AND FEDERAL LAWS AND LAWS OF DIFFERENT STATES.

The second section of the Bailey bill provides as follows:

"Such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides. * * * The property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act."

Suppose that the laws of the State where the debtor resides and the proposed law shall be in conflict; which will prevail? It is really of no importance to the debtor which will prevail, since the conflict will defeat the objects of the bill; i. e., such conflicts will, without his fault, prevent his securing a discharge.

Suppose that a debtor has property in several States—which is true of a large percentage of all of the debtors in the country—how can the assignments in the different States all be in accord with the laws of the States where he resides, in view of the fact that the laws of all of the States and Territories are diverse?

The report on the bill of Mr. BAILEY, in referring to the administration of estates under present State insolvency laws, says:

"The fraudulent practices so injurious and demoralizing in their effect upon all communities will in a measure cease, and many traders whose transactions are now a false pretense will resume their business in an open and honorable way."

There can not be any good reason, so far as we can see, for compelling debtors and creditors to continue to seek, as at present, their rights under such State laws as are here described.

We think it a mighty poor compliment to Congress to suggest that it can not pass a wise and comprehensive law, under which the rights of both debtors and creditors will be secure.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we had ever read the Federal Constitution? We think not.

If we were to join the author of this bill in formulating a new government we might consider the advisability of giving a joint jurisdiction over this subject to State and Federal courts; we might also try to overcome the possibility of each one of such courts deciding a different way and thereby bringing about a serious conflict between the States and the Federal Government, to be fought out at the expense of the unfortunate bankrupts who might try to exercise their constitutional rights under it. But since the State and Federal Governments have been organized on the basis of each being separate, and each having courts to interpret and enforce its laws, we feel constrained to accept the situation as we find it and advocate a law to be administered in the Federal courts in a plain, simple, and economical way.

There never has been such a law enacted as is here proposed in this or any other country. Why should we make such a departure now, when we can instead enact a plain law which will be administered in the courts which administer our other laws, and thus avoid a possibility of unfortunate conflicts between the State and Federal courts and between the courts of the several States.

When the bill we submit shall have been read it will be found that it can be promptly enforced for the impartial benefit of all parties who attempt to conduct transactions on credit but meet with misfortune.

NEEDLESS AND ENORMOUS COSTS.

Section 5 of the Bailey bill provides—

"That the creditors of the debtor shall be made parties defendant, and shall have thirty days notice of the filing of the same, notice to be given as in suits in the courts of the United States, and shall have thirty days thereafter in which to answer said petition."

The cost of securing service on the creditors, which an ordinary debtor has, as above provided, would be enormous; it is very doubtful if the insolvent with many creditors could raise the money with which to pay them. In the case of a debtor not owing a very large amount in the aggregate, but owing small sums to a large number of creditors, the costs of securing service on the creditors might amount to more than the indebtedness. Clearly this bill will not be available for a vast army of painstaking, economical, and worthy men, who have become debtors in a small way; it can be of service only to those who have operated on a scale of magnificent proportions. Under the bill we advocate the creditors would be notified at a trifling expense.

If the petition should be dismissed the costs of course would fall upon the petitioner; if the prayer of the petition is granted in the proceedings in which they shall have been "made parties defendant," and of which they have been given "thirty days notice," and in which they shall have thirty days "in which to answer said petition," would they not be mulcted in the costs?

Why should we require the payment of the costs of two courts by a poor debtor, whom we are professedly trying to assist in a financial way, when the costs of one would suffice? The costs of the assignment might be paid out of the estate, if there was one, but if not, the debtor would have to pay them. As the debtor is required to first make an assignment of all of his unexempt property before he can apply for a discharge, it follows that, if he has done so in good faith, he will have only his exempt property with which to meet this outlay, which, if his creditors are numerous, will be enormous.

There is a very large class of honest men now in the country to whom the benefits of a bankruptcy law should be immediately available; they have no property either exempt or unexempt; they could not pay the enormous costs provided by this bill, and hence it would not be of any benefit to them. If a debtor shall file an affidavit with his petition, under the law we advocate, that he is without money and can not raise a sufficient sum to pay the costs in his case, he will be permitted to receive all of its benefits without the payment of any sum.

The chief purpose of all laws is to prevent the strong imposing on the weak; to keep the dishonest from robbing the honest; and to enforce the Golden Rule in the affairs of life. We do not want a bankruptcy law which we may enact to be an exception to the rule. It therefore must be a measure which can be cheaply administered so as to be available to all classes.

The complete bill requires strict economy on the part of all officers and others who assist in its administration. It will not apply to the affairs of honest, solvent people, but to the affairs of approximately one in one hundred each year of those who do business or conduct enterprises, in whole or in part, on credit, i. e., one in one hundred is about the percentage of those who fail in the course of a year. It is not in any sense a law which will serve as a guide for commencing or conducting business or enterprises, or as a guide in the affairs of everyday life, but is only for the compromise or settlement of the affairs of the unfortunate, or the administration of the estates of dishonest persons, and of unfortunates where a compromise can not be effected.

The bill we advocate will protect the debtor from the avarice of a "Shylock" creditor; it will give him an opportunity to secure a fair compromise, notwithstanding it might be opposed by a minority of creditors who are moved by malice or greed, and who, under present laws, may pursue him to the final sale under the sheriff's red flag; it will secure him his State exemptions, and will, if he is honest, give him a discharge. It will protect the creditor from the fraud of the debtor; it will secure him a pro rata share with other creditors of the same class of the debtor's estate promptly and at small cost.

In brief, in the event bankruptcy intervenes at any time from the inception of the transaction by which one party voluntarily becomes a debtor and the other a voluntary creditor, and during the entire time until the debt is satisfied, the rights of both of the parties will be more perfectly preserved and be more readily and cheaply enforced than under the Bailey bill, or pursuant to the present State insolvency laws.

Ought we not to pass the bill which will in the best sense, and at the smallest cost, serve the interests of the whole people?

IT OUGHT NOT BE LIMITED TO TWO YEARS.

Section 6 of the Bailey bill provides that the—

"Act shall continue in force two years and no longer." * * *

Debtors have failed from day to day since the repeal of the last bankruptcy law, but have been unable to secure a discharge; this bill proposes to accommodate some of them, but as soon as two years shall have expired, proposes that thereafter none of those who fail shall be entitled to a like benefit under the law.

We do not see any reason why a distinction should be made between the rights of the debtor who has failed, or who shall fail prior to the expiration of the proposed law, and the one who shall fail after it has ceased to be in force.

The provision of the Constitution is not that we shall enact for a short time a law for the benefit of those who may happen to be unfortunate during such period, but it is "to establish" such a law "throughout the United States."

We maintain that it is the right of every citizen to have the benefit of such a law, and that it ought to be permanently upon the statute books and at all times available, to both honest debtors and honest creditors. Such are the provisions of the bill we advocate.

This bill should remain permanently upon the statute books, if it is the embodiment of what was contemplated by the Constitution; if it is not such a law, it ought not to be passed.

Why not make a bankruptcy law as permanent as any other law? What would be thought of us as legislators if we provided only at intervals for the exercise of the other constitutional rights of the people?

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we know that to "establish" the Federal Constitution meant that we were to enjoy the rights secured by it for all time and not for a short period from time to time; or that we know that the word "establish," as used in the preamble, is the same word "establish" which is used in conferring on Congress the power which it is here sought to exercise only for two years? We think not.

Honest men do not fail in classes or only at given periods, nor are they proceeded against by their creditors only in certain years, but from day to day, year in and year out. Rascals do not commit frauds to order, but have done so every night for past ages, and will continue to do so during the ages to come.

We ought, therefore, without further delay, first, to read, and then patiently, wisely, and without prejudice to consider the subject, pass the complete bill, and trust to our successors to amend it from time to time, if occasion shall require, so that honest debtors and honest creditors shall at all times find relief and protection under it.

VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

The terms voluntary and involuntary, as used in bankruptcy legislation, apply, or at least ought to apply, solely to the proceedings prior to the rendition of the judgment by which the debtor is declared a bankrupt, i. e., a voluntary bankrupt is one who has filed his own petition, and an involuntary bankrupt is one against whom a petition has been filed by his creditors; after the judgment is rendered, the rights and duties of the bankrupt or his creditors do not and should not differ in any respect.

Debtors who may be adjudged bankrupts should be considered under four headings, as follows: First, insolvent honest voluntary bankrupts; second, fraudulent voluntary bankrupts; third, insolvent honest involuntary bankrupts; and, fourth, fraudulent involuntary bankrupts.

The first class embraces honest insolvents who have petitioned voluntarily for the benefits of the law. There is no disagreement, either in the committee or the House, among the members who are willing to exercise the powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, as to the wisdom of providing, without further delay, for the members of this class.

Those who may be placed in the second class, i. e., fraudulent voluntary bankrupts, are those who have obtained or retained property fraudulently, placed it beyond the reach of their creditors, and voluntarily petitioned for the benefits of the law. The only object which a member of this class would have in going into bankruptcy would be to get a discharge and be thereby the better enabled to enjoy his ill-gotten gains. We do not believe that there is a disposition on the part of the members of this committee to favor this class of men, and yet we know that they, in large numbers at least, could obtain undeserved discharges under the Bailey bill.

The third class, i. e., insolvent honest involuntary bankrupts, is composed of persons who have become insolvent, are unable to pay their debts or protect their property from being inequitably distributed among their creditors, and have therefore, pursuant to proceedings by their creditors, had their property, over and above their State exemptions, turned over to a trustee to be ratably distributed; they will be entitled to a discharge. There is a disagreement among the members of the committee as to this class.

Our opponents say, in effect, that no relief under the provisions of involuntary bankruptcy should be granted to debtors so situated or to their creditors; that a debtor should be left at the mercy of his individual creditors without an opportunity to deal with them as a class; that it is right and desirable that his estate should be taken by those who seize it first, or be kept by those to whom the debtor may deliver it, and that creditors who have extended credit to a common debtor on equal terms shall not necessarily share in his estate on equal terms, or grant him favors on the same basis, but that those who first bring a suit against him shall be paid in full, and those who are most considerate to him shall get nothing.

We contend that a debtor who is insolvent and can not pay his debts, or protect his estate from an unequal division, should have the protection of the complete bill, which will permit him to retain his exemptions, procure a discharge, and enable each of his creditors, of the same class, to receive their pro rata of his estate. Our opponents say that the possibility of there being such a class will give the cruel creditor an undue advantage over the honest debtor. We show that such is not the case; that the cruel creditor may now pursue, in the ordinary course, his debtor to a final sacrifice sale under the scarlet emblem of the executioner; that such a pursuit may not only be to the financial disadvantage of the debtor, but of the other creditors as well.

We also show that under the bill we advocate the bankrupt will not be at the mercy of the individual creditor, as at present; that the favors which the bankrupt may receive in the form of an extension of time or a reduction of his indebtedness, or both, will be from his creditors as a class and by the decree of a court of equity; that these favors will not be extended or withheld according to the whim of the creditors and as a charity, as at present, but will be available for the benefit of the debtor and his creditors alike, and may be enforced as provided by the Constitution.

The fact that debtors may have the protection as above will make men more willing than at present to conduct and extend business, conceive enterprises, and borrow money to promote them, thereby becoming debtors. The fact that creditors will thus be put upon an equal footing with other creditors of the same class will make them more willing to sell property for which they have or have not paid, and to loan money which they have accumulated or borrowed.

It follows, therefore, that the omission of this class, i. e., insolvent honest involuntary bankrupts, would render the system of bankruptcy legislation incomplete, and injure debtors and creditors by omitting these provisions for their protection.

There ought not to be, as it seems to us, but there are, differences of opinion among the members about the fourth class, i. e., fraudulent involuntary bankrupts. Their property should be distributed to the extent of the payment of their debts; they should be refused a discharge and punished for their wrongdoing. This should be done not only because deserved in the individual case, but as an example to deter those who are morally weak from essaying the same role.

The Bailey bill does not make any provision for the protection of the people from the machinations of fraudulent involuntary bankrupts; they will be protected under the bill we advocate. This omission from the Bailey bill should be a sufficient reason, even if there were not numerous others, why the complete bill should be substituted for it.

Those who say that there is a demand for any law which is short of a complete and just one, have never felt the pulses of the sturdy men whose predecessors framed the Constitution, and whose brains conceive, integrity plumbs, and industry carries on, from day to day, the industrial and commercial transactions of the country.

THE LAW OF THE "POOR ENGLISH GENTLEMEN."

In England in very early times there was no such thing as a voluntary bankruptcy law, but all laws upon that subject were involuntary and applied only to traders. Later there was a voluntary scheme for "poor English gentlemen," and under it they might avoid imprisonment for debt; but if guilty of fraud they were subjected to onerous punishments.

A purely voluntary system of bankruptcy, applicable to all classes, has never been in force in this or any other country.

In the evolution of thought upon this subject it was discovered that voluntary bankruptcy might be extended to debtors who were traders, since, if they became insolvent and could not protect their property from an equitable division, or were guilty of fraud, the rights of their creditors could be protected under the provisions of the law of involuntary bankruptcy. As a result the voluntary feature was added to the involuntary law in Great Britain by 6 George IV, chapter 16, and since then the two systems have been one. Prior to 1861 the involuntary system applied only to traders. In that year the complete system, i. e., voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, was extended in England so as to apply, and still applies, alike to all classes.

It does not seem possible that the House of Representatives of the United States wants to go back to the abandoned law of the "poor English gentlemen" as a precedent for legislative action.

The part of a bankruptcy law most difficult to draft is its voluntary provisions; they must not only provide relief for the honest bankrupt, but they must refuse relief or encouragement to the dishonest bankrupt. It would be quite easy to write a bill saying that the court should grant applications for discharges; the passage of such a law would result in good honest poor men getting discharges, and in so far it would be a good law, but it would also enable a lot of rascals to escape the payment of just debts, and in that respect it would be a bad law.

The fact that all debtors might get a discharge, without the possibility of the interference of their creditors, would curtail credits and do untold harm to all of the members of that great class who conduct their various transactions on credit, and in that respect also would be a bad law. All of the scandals under the old law grew out of proceedings under its provisions for voluntary bankruptcy.

The only ways yet discovered to keep the frauds under a voluntary law down to the minimum, are to make it possible for parties in interest to interfere, by commencing involuntary proceedings, before the fraudulent plans have been consummated and the property secreted or wasted, to provide adequate punishment for fraudulent acts, and to refuse a discharge to dishonest bankrupts.

The measure in question is an imperfect voluntary bill. It is not provided with effective safeguards, for the protection of the rights of honest debtors or honest creditors, but is calculated to encourage every wrong which is known to rascals.

We think that a bankruptcy law ought to apply to all classes of our citizens, as well as be uniform throughout the country.

The "poor English gentleman" law answered a purpose in its time, but it is not adapted to a country where there is no imprisonment for debt; it does not meet the needs of the majority of American citizens, who are all rich—not always in money, but always in integrity, in energy, and in opportunities to promote their own happiness. We of the United States want a fair and complete law, which shall be comprehensive of the subject and under which the rights of all classes will be secure.

ALL DEBTORS ARE NOT POOR NOR ALL CREDITORS RICH.

It seems to us that the most tenable theory upon which a purely voluntary law may be advocated, in opposition to a complete law, is that all debtors are poor, and hence ought to be favored, and all creditors are rich, and for that reason ought not to be protected by bankruptcy legislation. It goes without saying that this theory is not true. Most men engaging in either small or large transactions occupy the dual position of both debtor and creditor. One of the largest classes of creditors in the country is the day laborers. The largest class of debtors in the country is the railroads; they owe more than six times the amount of the national debt; the next largest class is the banks.

Let us consider some of the conditions to which it is proposed by our opponents to apply a voluntary law, and to which we propose to apply both the voluntary and involuntary or complete law. Suppose we take cotton and trace it from the raw material on the plantation until it returns as a cloth to be used by the planter, and, for the purpose of illustration, say that it is handled on the entire circuit on credit and at the same price. When the cotton is sold to the factor, the planter thereby becomes a creditor and the factor becomes a debtor. The manufacturer buys it and becomes a debtor and transforms the factor into a creditor. The manufacturer makes it into cloth and then sells it to the wholesaler; he in turn changes from a debtor to a creditor, and the wholesaler becomes the debtor. The wholesaler becomes a creditor by selling it to the retailer, who thereby becomes a debtor. The planter when he buys the cloth becomes a debtor and the retailer a creditor. Each person named has in turn been a voluntary debtor and a voluntary creditor. The debit and credit side of every transaction has been exactly equal and the totals are, of course, equal.

Why should the planter, the factor, the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and the retailer, who have all in turn become voluntary debtors, have any advantages as such debtors, pursuant to national legislation, without at the same time having reciprocal advantages as voluntary creditors with reference to the same transactions and property? Every article of raw material the product of which is used by the producer may be traced in like manner. The example holds good and the reasoning is unanswerable irrespective of whether the contracts of exchange from the producer through middlemen to the consumer relate to the same article in its different stages or to different articles which may be voluntarily exchanged for the convenience or profit of the people.

Roughly speaking, the planter and farmer must pay for the products of the mills and looms with the products of the fields; the laborer must pay for the comforts of life with the products of labor; the business man must pay his expenses with the profits on his merchandise; and the man of wealth must pay for his luxuries with the income from his fortune. The same is true of everyone of every class, i. e., everyone must pay for everything bought with something produced or acquired. Why, therefore, should anyone who buys or sells on credit be favored by national legislation to the detriment of the other party to the same transaction?

It therefore follows that there is no reasonable theory upon which a bankruptcy law should be passed in the interest of any one class. Such a law, like all other laws, ought to be in the best interests of the whole people. Any class law ought not to be passed.

THE BAILEY BILL WOULD DESTROY CREDIT.

Business and commerce have suffered a paralytic stroke; agriculture and the industries have been seized with the palsy. Even if they shall now recover, they will be liable to a recurrence under the present diverse State laws. The votaries of each need a restoration of confidence between themselves, and between them and the possessors of accumulated wealth, to enable them to secure credit and money with which to pursue their callings for securing profit and enjoying happiness.

Can this result be accomplished by the passage of a law, such as the Bailey bill, under which the poor debtor and the rich debtor may alike secure a discharge, except that individuals can not secure a discharge from fiduciary debts, irrespective of whether they are honest or dishonest, if they make an assignment more than three months before the passage of this bill, or after its passage, and before it expires by limitation? We say no. We do say that such confidence can be restored, and such results achieved under the bill we advocate, since under it the rights of both debtors and creditors will be more secure than under the present State laws.

The principle of the voluntary bill has been condemned by the people and the press; not only the principle of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, but the terms of the bill we advocate have been approved throughout the length and breadth of the country by all classes of honest people.

The fact that wrongs may be perpetrated in the industrial and commercial world makes it necessary to erect and maintain expensive safeguards; just in proportion as the laws are complete and wise these expensive safeguards are not necessary; just in proportion as the laws are imperfect and permissive of wrongdoing, these safeguards must be fortified. These expenses are not paid by the rascals who occasion them, but by the honest consumers who support the toilers of the industrial and commercial world.

There has occasionally been before the House a bill which, if enacted, would ruin, in a financial sense, a single class of men; but there never has been one before it, to our knowledge, so far-reaching in its destructive qualities as this one, or so well calculated to destroy the credit of all classes, by preventing honest men buying goods and borrowing money, except upon prime security or mortgage. Never before have we had before us such a bill as this one, under which all debtors, except persons who have become such in a fiduciary capacity, might be discharged only to find that they could not buy goods or borrow money, because it would be possible under the law that they might, upon receiving such goods or money, make away with them and again get a discharge, and thereby rob their beneficiaries and bring distrust and bad repute upon all honest debtors.

Would the passage of this bill indicate that we know that the affairs of everyday life, including business and enterprises, can not be extensively and successfully carried on without credit; that credit is founded upon confidence, and that confidence can not exist, in a general sense, except under good and impartial laws? We think not.

Why curtail credit by the passage of this bill when we can, by the enactment of a complete one, extend it?

By reading the bill we recommend it will be seen that it is comprehensive of the best interests of all parties. It will therefore beget confidence in both debtors and creditors and result in an extension of credit and the increase of the industries and commerce. For these reasons, as well as others, it ought to be passed.

HONEST DEBTORS DO NOT WANT, AND THE DISHONEST SHOULD NOT HAVE, A PURELY VOLUNTARY LAW.

There are many hundreds of thousands of present helpless, honest, insolvent men in the country who, while pursuing their chosen avocations, have had their property swept away in legal warfare between their creditors.

This vast number of men are either out of employment or are serving in menial places at small compensation, unable to make headway against the ever increasing interest upon their indebtedness or to accumulate property upon which to pay taxes and with the income of which to support their families and educate their children. These men have not been able to secure discharges because the States can not grant them, since, under the Federal Constitution, States can not impair the obligations of contracts; the State may give them relief from that part of their debts due to creditors of their own State, but not from creditors living in another State. So many of this class of men as become insolvents without fraud ought to be relieved under a wise bankruptcy law.

Honest debtors not engaged in any enterprise or business do not want such a law, because it would destroy or greatly impair credit, and hence after obtaining a discharge under it they would not be able to buy property on credit and borrow money with which to endeavor to repair their fortunes. The enactment of a complete law would enable them to secure a discharge, and would so strengthen credit as to enable them to buy property and borrow money and enter upon and prosecute their chosen callings for their own advancement and in the best interests of the communities in which they live.

The leading characteristic of a bankruptcy law is that it enables a debtor to secure a discharge from his debts—to have his debts paid in effect by the judgment of a court of equity, not a judgment that he has a defense to the claim of his creditor or has paid his debts, but that because of a wise public policy he is excused from paying them. Honest men would, if possible, pay their debts instead of asking for the protection of such a law.

No dishonest man would pay a debt if he could by fraud and perjury get a discharge, and herein lies the one great danger to honest men—the poor and rich alike—of having a bankruptcy law passed. The only excuse for incurring this danger is the great benefit that such a law will be to honest debtors and honest creditors. This danger ought to be reduced to the minimum; it can not be done under a purely voluntary law, not even a plain and simple one; it can only be done by adding to the voluntary law the provisions of the involuntary law, i. e., by putting the debtor and his creditors upon the same basis and giving them reciprocal rights.

It would be bad enough if a voluntary law simply gave to the rich rascal a right to swindle the poor and rich creditors who trusted him, but that is not the half of the wrong done; the success of one rich rascal would beget others; the existence of a class of rich rascals, created and fostered by a national law, would so destroy confidence between men, who buy and sell property and borrow and loan money, that their transactions would be curtailed, and the price of commodities would be increased to consumers, and the interest on money would be advanced to borrowers.

That class of unfortunates, the members of which arrived at their present state through fraud or dishonesty, ought not to be relieved by a discharge, but ought to continue to be liable financially to their outraged creditors. A purely voluntary law might enable them to secure an unmerited discharge, and hence ought not to be enacted.

It is an axiom in equity jurisprudence that those who invoke the rules of equity must do equity; we might with equal reason establish a rule in bankruptcy legislation that those who would be discharged from their honest obligations must be honest men.

PERSONS WHO ARE BOTH DEBTORS AND CREDITORS DO NOT WANT A PURELY VOLUNTARY LAW.

There are very few men engaged in business, in tilling the fields, in working the mines, in manufacturing, or in any of the other industries or enterprises but who are debtors to a greater or less extent and at the same time are creditors.

As a matter of fact very few of all the transactions had in conducting the entire business and promoting all of the resources of the country are for cash. The greater part of all of them are conducted on credit.

It is of the utmost importance that every one of these men who voluntarily becomes a debtor should have the protection of a law under which it shall not be possible for a single creditor to break him up in business, as is possible under the present laws; that is to say, it is usual for a debtor to have many creditors; they are frequently residents of different States and strangers to each other. Any one of these creditors may hear a rumor, either founded or unfounded, as to the solvency of a common debtor, and, if so, he must in financial self-defense, under present conditions, act promptly and in a way to prevent other creditors from obtaining a priority. The result is that great numbers of honest competent men, who, on a fair showing, are solvent and with a little time could pull through, are needlessly driven into liquidation.

Persons who are both debtors and creditors, in so far as they are creditors, are interested in preventing the commission of fraud and the giving of preferences by their debtors. They are themselves debtors, and as such, must pay the amounts which they owe in that capacity, and in order to do so they must be able to collect the amounts which are due them in their capacity as creditors. They must avoid, if possible, suffering a total loss of any of the claims which they have against other debtors. Since only about one in a hundred of those who owe them becomes a bankrupt in the course of a year, they would be practically out of danger if the law we advocate were in force, so that they might be secured against total losses.

The foregoing class of debtors do not want a purely voluntary law, because it would destroy or impair the credit which now enables them to buy property and borrow money, and would hence prove of untold injury to them; a complete voluntary and involuntary law would not harm them in any but would help them in every way. The opportunities of this class to enjoy prosperity ought not to be sacrificed because a voluntary law might prove beneficial to dishonest debtors, who would use it to swindle alike their poor and their rich creditors.

Those who are thus always members of both classes do not want, in their capacity as debtors, any rights, without having at the same time, in their capacity as creditors, reciprocal or corresponding rights. The bill we advocate conforms to their wants, and hence should be passed in their best interests.

CREDITORS DO NOT WANT AN INVOLUNTARY LAW ONLY, BUT A COMPLETE ONE.

The largest class of creditors in this country is composed of those who are employed in various capacities and whose work is necessary to carry on the transactions of the country, and who always have wages due them by their employers from day to day, week to week, or month to month. They are generally employed by those who are debtors—not only for such services, but for materials of all sorts.

There is another class composed simply of creditors, made up for the most part of men who have accumulated a financial competency, either by their own labors or by inheritance, and who make a livelihood by reason of the earning capacity of such competency. This class are quite as anxious to make advantageous investments as others are to buy their property or borrow their money. Just in proportion as the laws are secure they will sell their property or loan their money at long distances from home.

As an illustration of the effect which the laws have upon the members of the creditor class, who have accumulated fortunes, let us suppose a different condition of the laws in two States; let them be Arkansas and Texas. The supposition with regard to Arkansas is that the laws for the collection of debt are so perfect that every creditor, so desiring, may proceed against his debtor and secure, within a reasonable time, a hearing and a just determination of his rights, at small cost; the supposition is, also, that a wise bankruptcy law is in force, so that the affairs of the bankrupts may be promptly adjusted by arbitration, compromise, or administration.

The supposition with regard to Texas is that an attempt by a creditor to collect a debt from a debtor is hedged about with imperfections in the laws, so that a just determination of the rights of parties litigant would always be greatly prolonged and the satisfaction of a judgment well-nigh impossible; the supposition is also that there is no bankruptcy law in force, and, as a result, pretty nearly every failure will, in the end, amount to a few creditors being paid in full and the rest getting nothing. In which of these two States, under the imaginary conditions as above, would the man of an accumulated fortune be most willing to sell property and loan money? It is a self-evident proposition that he would prefer in every instance, under like conditions, to deal with residents of Arkansas instead of Texas. It would be necessary, in order to induce him to refuse business in Arkansas and accept it in Texas, to increase the profit on property and the rate of interest in the latter State over that charged in the former.

Just in proportion, therefore, as the diverse laws of the States, with reference to assignments, are superseded by one good uniform bankruptcy law, property will be sold on a smaller profit and money loaned at a smaller rate of interest than at present.

Laborers and capitalists are both interested in the enlargement of the debtor class, since the one personally wishes employment, and the other seeks an opportunity to sell goods on credit, or loan money. Any law, therefore, which is designed to protect the interest of debtors will make men more willing to become debtors by giving employment to laborers, buying goods, and borrowing money, and hence will promote the wellbeing of laborers, capitalists, and other members of the creditor class.

CONSUMERS WOULD BE INJURED BY A PURELY VOLUNTARY LAW.

Consumers constitute the class for whose gratification the fields are made to yield their harvests; for whose comfort the looms and mills are put in operation; for the delight of whose fancy chemicals are made to perform wonders and the dextrous fingers of the artist touch the brush to canvas, and for whose benefit the industries are pursued and commerce conducted.

Whenever a series of transactions which result in catering to consumers' wants can be conducted promptly and without fraud or misfortune, the cost is very much less than if they are accompanied by the wrong doing or misfortune of the persons engaged in conducting such transactions.

In this country the great bulk of all the products of the earth, both as raw material and as transformed by the deft hand of man, is consumed in a State other than where produced or transformed. The laws of all of the States relating to dishonesty and misfortune are diverse. Generally speaking every one of the products of the country, when handled by a dishonest man who happens at the time to be prosecuted, or by one who happens just then to have reached the apex of his misfortune, must have added the expenses of such dishonesty or misfortune to its reasonable selling price, and the consumers must pay it.

The Bailey bill does not substitute one good law for the many poor ones, and therefore does not grant any relief to consumers. The bill we advocate substitutes one equitable law for the many, some of which permit debtors to be needlessly ruined and some of which permit creditors to be robbed.

The consumers, therefore, are interested in the enactment of the bill we advocate, since it is a wise and conservative measure and under it fraud will be reduced to the minimum, the rigors of misfortune will be ameliorated, and, as a consequence, the price of commodities will be reduced.

DOES THE BILL AND REPORT OF MR. BAILEY ADMIT THE NECESSITY FOR A COMPLETE BANKRUPT LAW.

The introduction and reporting of the Bailey bill by those members who have heretofore been classed as opponents of the Torrey bankruptcy bill, seems to us to be an admission that the State insolvency laws are not comprehensive of the rights of parties to transactions on credit, and hence ought to be superseded or supplemented by a national bankruptcy law.

In referring to the subject of discharges Mr. Bailey in his report says:

"Many men are to-day conducting their business under other names and concealing their property. * * * The fraudulent practices so injurious and demoralizing in their effect upon all communities will, in a measure, cease, and many traders, whose transactions are now a false pretense, will resume their business in an open and honorable way."

The present imperfect and diverse State laws are responsible for the deplorable conditions admitted above. Since it is necessary to pass a national law to ameliorate these admitted conditions such State insolvent laws ought not to be continued in force but be superseded by it.

It is provided by the second section of the Bailey bill as follows:

"That such assignment shall be * * * for the equal benefit of all of his creditors, subject to all valid liens." * * *

The fifth section provides that a discharge shall be given to a debtor if—

"No creditor of such debtor had been preferred in any manner except as authorized by this act, and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor respecting his business or estate to prevent an equal distribution of his estate among his creditors, or to give one creditor an advantage over another, * * * and that no attachment has been levied upon the property of such debtor, * * * Provided however, That if, within four months after the levy of any attachment, the debtor shall execute an assignment or cession and file a petition for discharge as herein provided for, the execution of such assignment and the filing of such petition shall vacate the levy of such attachment." * * *

The report of Mr. BAILEY on his bill says:

"The greatest difficulty which your committee have encountered in this part of their work was to prevent preferences being given through collusive attachments."

An insolvent debtor, who has made an assignment, has no available financial interest in his estate, except his exemptions.

It is right, or it is wrong, that the estate of an insolvent debtor, who has made an assignment, should be equitably distributed among his creditors; this bill admits that an equitable distribution is right.

Since it is admitted that it is not right that one creditor should swindle another of equal rights when they both have amounts due them from an insolvent debtor who makes an assignment, it follows that it is not right to do so when their common debtor is insolvent, but is not willing to make an assignment. As to the debtor who is insolvent, the rights of his creditors should be paramount to his rights, except with reference to his exemptions.

Since it is admitted that it is not right that one creditor of a common debtor, who has made an assignment, should collect his entire debt and thereby prevent his co-creditor, with equal rights, from collecting anything, it follows that it is not right to do so when it happens that their common debtor has acted dishonestly with reference to his property. Since such a debtor has acted dishonestly and thereby subjected his creditors to the danger of the loss of the value of their claims, their rights ought to be paramount to his.

It is also provided by the fifth section that a discharge shall be given to a debtor if—

"No act was done or suffered to be done by such debtor * * * to defraud his creditors."

It is right or it is wrong for an insolvent debtor, who has made an assignment, to defraud his creditors; this bill admits that it is not right for such a debtor to defraud his creditors.

Since it is admitted that it is not right for an insolvent debtor, who has made an assignment, to defraud his creditors, it follows that it is not right for an insolvent debtor, who has not made an assignment, to defraud his creditors. For the same reasons it is not right for a debtor who has acted dishonestly with reference to his property to defraud his creditors.

Section 5 provides that a discharge shall be given to a debtor if—

"Within three months before the passage of this act no creditor of such debtor had been preferred * * * and during said time no other act was done or suffered to be done * * * and that no attachment has been levied * * * : Provided," * * *

It is right, or it is wrong, without reference to time, for an insolvent debtor to give a preference to one creditor, when there are others of equal rights, or to defraud his creditors; this bill admits that it is not right to do so within three months before its passage.

Since it is admitted that it is not right for an insolvent debtor who has made an assignment to give a preference to one creditor, when there are others of equal rights, or to defraud his creditors, within three months before the bill is passed, it follows that it is not right that such preference should be given or such frauds committed either before or subsequent to such three months.

Right and wrong are not determined by the calendar; they are determined on principle—principle which is the same now that it has always been; principle which is the same now that it will be for all time to come.

We submit that the Bailey bill constitutes an admission of the necessity for the enactment of the complete bill, but that it is not sufficient to protect the rights of even any one class of honest debtors, to say nothing of the rights of creditors, and hence it ought not to be passed.

THE KIND OF A BANKRUPTCY LAW THE PEOPLE WANT.

The last bankruptcy law was repealed in 1878; ever since then there has been a continually increasing demand for legislation upon that subject by Congress.

Many hundreds of business men's associations, mechanics' exchanges, farmers' alliance and industrial unions, chambers of commerce, lawyers' clubs, boards of trade, tailors' exchanges, builders' organizations, retail associations, wholesale and jobbers' organizations, real-estate exchanges, traveling men's organizations, and other commercial, industrial, and professional bodies, almost without limit as to their objects of organization, in all parts of the country, have considered the subject and passed resolutions, addresses, and memorials, calling upon Congress to exercise its power under the Constitution. Not one of such bodies, or any other, has ever demanded a good voluntary law, or such a one as the State national measure of Mr. BAILEY.

Many of the foregoing bodies have in explicit terms protested against a voluntary law; among them we mention the Tacoma (Wash.) Chamber of Commerce; Mechanics' Exchange, St. Louis; National Association of Builders; Philadelphia Board of Trade; National Brick Manufacturers' Association; Portland (Oregon) Chamber of Commerce; Merchant Tailors' National Exchange; The National Paint, Oil, and Varnish Association; St. Louis Retail Grocers' Association, and the National Convention of the Representatives of the Commercial Bodies of the United States.

The St. Louis Butter and Cheese Dealers' Association; the National League of Commission Merchants of the United States; the Tacoma (Wash.) Commercial Club; and the National Board of Trade have all recently taken action opposing the incomplete and advocating the complete bill.

The proceedings of the foregoing bodies, together with the proceedings of other bodies and documents, appear in the appendix to this report, and will prove interesting and instructive to members.

Thousands of petitioners in every nook and corner of this broad land have petitioned for bankruptcy legislation, but no one of them has ever asked for a good voluntary law, or for such a State-national combination, or measure of mixed jurisdictions, as the Bailey bill.

The great mass of the people are honest and they want honest laws. Even the rogues want everybody else to be honest. Good laws promote honesty and make it easy to buy property and borrow money; bad laws encourage dishonesty and make it difficult to buy property and borrow money. The people know this and can not be deceived with makeshift temporary laws.

Trickery may win for a time in business and pretense may pose as enterprise, just as "noise" may pass for oratory, and experimental legislation seem to satisfy public opinion; but in this country, where every man is an elector and a freeman, it will be found sooner or later that trickery must give way to honest methods of business, that pretense will be followed by merit in enterprise, that "noise" will be superseded by sense and sentiment in oratory, and experimental legislation be displaced in the bright light of reason by that which is wise, comprehensive, and just to the whole people.

Why should we pass such a bill in preference to a complete one, since it does not accord with precedents, embodies an experiment, is of doubtful constitutionality, and is not demanded by any interest or individual outside of Congress?

THE OPPONENTS AND FRIENDS OF BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION.

George Washington and his associates, of the Constitutional Convention, in formulating the scheme of our National Government with reference to its relationship to the State governments, gave the power to establish uniform bankruptcy laws to Congress. When a plan was formulated for the establishment of the Confederacy, it, too, contained a similar provision; this was true of both the provisional and the permanent constitutions.

There are members of the House who think that they are wiser than were Washington and his associates, and those who proposed to establish the Confederate government. These members, so far as they have spoken, have criticised us and given vent to vituperative abuse of the bill, instead of proposing to amend the Constitution or endeavoring to point out defects in the bill.

Possibly our constitutional forefathers were wrong in granting this power to Congress, but we do not think so; even if we did it would not change the fact that since we have the power we ought to exercise it for the best interests of the people we represent. The members who thus disagree with our constitutional forefathers should fight it out with them and not with us or the bill we advocate.

We are earnestly trying to perform, rather than shirk, a duty which was left for us to perform, and the bill we advocate is unquestionably the best measure which has ever been drafted as the embodiment of the power which we are called upon to exercise.

The members of the House who wish a purely voluntary law enacted may be said to constitute two classes; first, those who entertain the mistaken belief that the debtors of the country would be benefited by such a law; and, second, those who think they are wiser than Washington and his associates and those who drafted the constitution of the Confederacy, but, instead of saying so frankly, assume the disguise of pretending to favor a purely voluntary system of bankruptcy, which they realize would be impracticable if not unconstitutional.

The two classes of members as last above, in so far as they have been heard from, have usually begun a consideration of the subject in one of two ways. They have either, first, tried to elbow us in part out of our position as the representatives of the honest poor debtor, the honest rich debtor, and the honest poor creditor and the honest rich creditor, and then arrogate to themselves the exclusive right to represent the debtor class; or, second, they have improperly and without justification stated that the bankruptcy movement, which has been in existence all over the country for many years, was organized by wicked people for improper purposes and that we are chosen as their misguided representatives.

Neither of their allegations is correct; neither of them will deceive anybody who has the slightest inclination to know the truth. The facts are that we represent the cause of honest people of all classes in the truest and best sense. The advocates of the Bailey bill do not represent anybody outside of Congress who has ever filed a paper upon the subject of bankruptcy legislation in either the House of Representatives or the Senate, so far as we know. Their utterances do not show a wish, on their part, to carry out the provisions of the Constitution in a comprehensive way. The terms of their bill contradict the assertion that they know the provisions of the Constitution and wish to comply with them.

The principal opposition to the enactment of the Torrey bankruptcy bill, outside of Congress, arises from the selfish interest of a few great houses; they have extensive and expensive legal departments for the protection of their interests, and find that in the present chaotic condition of the State laws they can take advantage of defaulting debtors and associate creditors with greater financial advantage than they could under a uniform equitable law. An additional element of opposition comes from people who are opposed to laws of all kinds for the enforcement of personal and property rights, and wish to have a free latitude for the commission of fraud. It may be said also that there is some opposition founded upon ignorance as to the history, purposes, and probable effects of the measure in question. It is a singular spectacle to thus see opulent selfishness using as a cat's paw fraudulent desire and stupid ignorance in an endeavor to prevent honest legislation as provided by the Constitution.

The bill we advocate is comprehensive of the rights of the whole people, so far as it may affect them. It contains a perfectly fair and impartial voluntary bankruptcy law, for the benefit of those honest unfortunates who are hopelessly insolvent to-day; for the benefit of those who are debtors and creditors to-day, but unfortunately may need relief under it to-morrow; and for the benefit of those who are creditors only to-day, but who may be poor debtors to-morrow. It contains a perfectly fair and impartial involuntary bankruptcy law, which will protect those who are both debtors and creditors, and those who are only creditors, from the incompetency, insolvency, and fraud of their debtors; and it will also protect the creditors of a common debtor from the frauds of each other. It is, in brief, the shield of honest men, be they rich or poor, against the machinations of dishonest men, be they rich or poor.

On our part there is no utterance by any of our friends, which has appeared in the press or been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which shows a disposition to legislate in a partial way, or for or against any class as against any other class, or on behalf of or in opposition to any part of the country. The bill we advocate, in every line and in every sentence, is fair and just to all parties. It will not, therefore, avail the opposition anything to cast reflections upon us or abuse the bill; our utterances contradict them and the bill by its terms shows that they are mistaken.

THE BAILEY BILL WAS VOTED DOWN IN THE FIFTY-FIRST CONGRESS AND ADVERSELY REPORTED IN THE FIFTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

Some years ago an amendment was submitted to a bankruptcy bill then pending in the Senate embodying the chief characteristics of the incomplete bill. Later and in the Fifty-first Congress a bill containing some of the principal features of that amendment was introduced in the House and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Pending a consideration of H. R. 3916 of that Congress (the Torrey bankruptcy bill) in the committee, it was moved to substitute that measure for it, but the motion was lost. Later it was submitted as a substitute in the House, and was defeated by a large majority, consisting of members of all political beliefs and from all parts of the country.

In the Fifty-second Congress Mr. BAILEY for the first time introduced substantially this bill, and its number was H. R. 459. The majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, in their report (No. 1674, Fifty-second Congress, first session; see appendix to this report) on it, said that by its terms it provided that a part of the bankruptcy proceedings should occur in the State courts and a part in the Federal courts. They expressed the belief that it would bring about unfortunate complications between such courts, prove unduly expensive, leave undiminished the opportunities for the commission of fraud, and not be satisfactory to the parties affected by it. They further expressed the fear that under its provisions all debtors, the dishonest as well as the honest, would be discharged from their debts.

They pointed out the fact that since the bill provided only for voluntary bankruptcy it left the dishonest debtor an opportunity to deliberately prepare for bankruptcy to the detriment of his creditors without giving them any right or opportunity to interfere and protect their interests, and stated that this fact would impair the credit of all honest debtors, and be of untold injury to them, and therefore recommended that it should be laid on the table.

A minority consisting of four of the then fifteen members of the committee filed their views, but did not defend this bill from the adverse report of the majority, nor advocate its enactment.

FAVORABLY REPORTED IN THE FIFTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

In the present Congress, substantially this bill was introduced for the second time by Mr. BAILEY as H. R. 391, but it was not reported by this committee. On December 11, 1893, Mr. BAILEY for the third time introduced this bill, as H. R. 4609, and on the day following it was for the first time in its history favorably considered and reported by the committee.

In reporting this bill its author says:

"It proposes no advantage for the honest debtor which was not accorded him * * * under the bill recently defeated in the House."

This statement constitutes an admission that this bill is not superior, so far as the rights of the debtor are concerned, to the bill which we submit as a substitute for it. If, therefore, it shall transpire that the bill we report embodies all of the rights of debtors which his bill does, and, in addition, protects the rights of all parties, then it will be perfectly clear that it ought to be substituted for his bill and then passed.

Mr. BAILEY, in his report, undertakes to create the impression that the repeal of bankruptcy laws in this country heretofore was because of their involuntary provisions.

We submit that the discontent with the last law did not arise out of its involuntary features; there never was any complaint under it that any debtor was "coerced into bankruptcy;" that law was repealed because of the very lax provisions of its voluntary system. Opposition to involuntary bankruptcy grows out of a theory of certain legislators; such opposition does not exist in the minds of the people.

The best that the author of this bill can say in its behalf, in his summing up of the report, is as follows:

"Your committee do not claim that the work which they have submitted to the House is by any means a perfect system. But appreciating the need for some measure of relief, and unwilling to recommend one which has been tried and repudiated, they have presented a measure which, even if it succeeds no better than the similar laws which have gone before it, can do no very great harm, because its duration is limited to two years."

Ought a bill to be passed when its greatest recommendation is that it "can do no very great harm?" We think not.

OUR CONCLUSIONS.

Our opinion of the Bailey bill, after not only reading but studying it very carefully, to state it as mildly as we possibly can, is that it is wrong in principle and incomplete in its provisions, and that its passage would retard rather than promote the best interests of the people.

In our judgment, the Torrey bankruptcy bill includes the good, but not the bad, features of prior legislation upon this subject; it is such a uniform law as the Constitution provided should be established throughout the United States; its enactment is demanded by the people, and we herewith submit it as a substitute for the Bailey bill, with the recommendation that it be passed.

I am strongly in favor of a uniform system of bankruptcy in the United States. The Constitution provides that the Congress shall have the power to make such a law, and in my judgment the interests of all our citizens demand that such a law be constantly upon the statute book. But such a law should be uniform, affecting all our citizens alike, whether they reside in one State or another, in one Territory or another. Such a law should be independent of the statutory enactments of any State, else innumerable conflicts will arise between the courts of the several States and the courts of the United States. Such conflicts are always to be deplored. The administration of a bankruptcy law should be as free from entanglements as possible and administered as inexpensively as it is possible to provide.

Again, a bankruptcy law should be just to the creditor class as well as to the debtor class. It should provide for the one as well as for the other. Such a law should not be made simply for the purpose of discharging debtors from their just debts and obligation. Such a law would not be a bankruptcy law in any just or proper sense. However, such is the bill now before the House, and it simply provides that those persons who have made assignments for the benefit of their creditors within their respective States under the laws of the State where the assignment is made, may be discharged from all their debts and obligations, except such as arise from defalcations while acting as officers or in a fiduciary capacity, provided they have not been guilty of any fraudulent act or concealment. It makes no provision, however, by which a creditor can force a dishonest or fraudulent creditor, however glaring the act of fraud, into bankruptcy, and hence the bill affords no sort of protection or remedy to the great creditor class.

If enacted and put in operation it will encourage the idle, the shiftless, and the dishonest to plunge head over heels into debt, live a life of extravagance as long as credit holds out, then make an assignment under the law of some State to which they may at any time remove, and after four months procure a discharge from all their indebtedness. These classes will be safe in so doing, for extravagance and high living will not defeat their discharge, and they may act as indicated with perfect impunity because they will know that by surrendering up the remnants of property left to them they will be sure of a discharge from all obligations under the provisions of this act.

Dishonest men will be safe in committing acts of rascality, for if they shall take time by the forelock and remove to a distance from their creditors their affairs will be administered under the laws of a State from one to three thousand miles distant from the residence of their creditors and they will be sure substantially that the persons to whom they are indebted will not follow them such a distance.

In the interest of honest men, in the interest of hard-working men, in the interest of our manufacturing and commercial classes, I am opposed to this bill, because it has in it the elements of socialism, of anarchy, of unthrift, and of dishonesty. It is a State-rights measure in every phase, and proposes that the Government of the United States shall step in and discharge debtors from their just obligations in all those cases where the States refuse. It has no other purpose or object, and works out no other result. If the estates are to be administered under the insolvent laws of the several States, then let the assignors be discharged, if at all, under the laws of the same States.

Gentlemen who are opposed to paternalism in the General Government should remember that this bill is paternal, in that it proposes to do what the several States have the power to do, but refuse to do. This bill proposes that the Government of the United States take care of the debtors, while the State takes care of the property. It says, Let the State do the disbursing, but let the United States do the discharging.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my purpose at this time is to direct the attention of the members of this House to the glaring defects that appear in this bill. It is entitled a bill "to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy." It should be entitled, and more appropriately would be entitled, a bill to release debtors from the obligations of contracts without consideration and to enable dishonest debtors to defraud their creditors. It will have this effect and no other; and in a very few minutes I think I can make this clear to every lawyer, at least, on the floor of this House.

Now, look at section 1 of this bill; it provides:

That if any debtor owing $200 or more shall execute an assignment of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside or be domiciled.

Then later on, "After four months he may present his petition in the district court of the United States for the district in which he then resides," and if he has not after the passage of this act committed any of the fraudulent acts specified in the bill, then he shall be discharged from all his debts.

Now, let us see what the effect of these provisions will be.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That is the rule of all bankrupt laws.

Mr. RAY. Oh, certainly it is not the rule of any bankruptcy bill or bankruptcy court, as the gentleman well knows, or ought to know. Now, let us see. The debtor must first make an assignment valid under the laws of the State or Territory in which he resides, or, if he choose, in the State in which he may be domiciled. So a citizen of the State of New York desiring to get the benefit of this act, and the assignment laws of the State of New York not being favorable enough to him, he leaves the State of New York and goes to the State of California or to the State of Texas, where the assignment laws are more favorable, and there he makes an assignment under the assignment laws of the State.

He does not reside there. He does not need under this act to take his property with him; he can leave it in the State of New York, where all his creditors reside, and make his assignment under the laws of the State of California, or perchance of Texas, if that State suits him better. Then what is the next step? The trustee resides in Texas or California, as the case may be. This is a law of the United States and protects the assignee, remember. This assignee may go to the State of New York, take possession of all this property, transfer it to California or to Texas, as the case may be, and this must be done because the trust is to be administered by this trustee or assignee, appointed in the State of Texas or California, according to the laws of such State.

So the property is removed 3,000 miles from the State of New York, where the creditors reside, to be distributed in a foreign jurisdiction. Then what is the next step? As provided by section 4, the debtor, four months from the date of the execution of the deed of assignment and the acceptance of the trust by the trustee, may file his petition for a discharge from his debts in the district court of the United States in the district in which he then resides.

Now, in the meantime he may have left his domicile or residence in the State where he made his domicile or residence when he made his assignment, and have gone to another State—Mississippi, Florida, or Oregon—still 3,000 miles, or thereabouts, distant from the State in which his creditors reside and in which the property was originally situated. He may take up his residence a thousand miles distant, and in a State foreign to the one in which he made this assignment, and there is his residence when he applies for his discharge. He applies for his discharge in the State in which he resides when he makes the application for his discharge.

Then what is next? All the creditors are brought in—the creditors in the case I am presenting all reside in the State of New York. They are made parties to the suit in bankruptcy in the State of Texas, Oregon, or California, as the case may be, and if they have any opposition to the discharge of this assignor, this alleged bankrupt, they must go 3,000 miles across the continent to defend this application for a discharge, and the trustee may be compelled to go a like distance. That is the bill as to these features of it. This is the natural logical and inevitable interpretation, and there is no escape from it.

Now, the gentleman who interrupted me a few minutes ago [Mr. STOCKDALE] well knows that in all the bankrupt laws we have heretofore had, the jurisdiction, control, and management of the bankrupt estate was confined to the United States district court in whose jurisdiction the debtor resided at the time he made the assignment, in the locality usually where all the debtors resided.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in order to be perfectly fair with the gentleman from New York, I will say to him that in the substitute the words "or be domiciled" will not appear; and therefore the argument he is making is not good.

Mr. RAY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that the gentleman from Texas has presented this measure to the House and until this moment has kept our side in complete ignorance of the bill that he really intends to ask us to vote upon. It simply indicates in my judgment that there must be a woodchuck in the wood pile.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman is entirely too ready to suspect. I had the substitute prepared this morning after I ascertained that this day was to be devoted to the consideration of the bill, and I have just received it from the Printing Office.

Mr. RAY. In all fairness I think it ought to have been in the hands of members before now.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman mean to say that it is customary to have a substitute which it is proposed to present before the House when a bill is called up for consideration made known in advance? It is not.

Mr. RAY. Well, almost anything is getting to be customary here, but it does seem to me that, in a matter of this importance, affecting all the commercial interests of this great country, the great debtor and the great creditor classes in New York, Boston, and Chicago, in all the great cities and throughout the whole country—it does seem to me that such a measure ought to be before this body for sometime before we are called upon to debate it or to vote upon it.

In such a matter this House certainly ought not to be called on to act hastily. I am glad to find that the gentleman from Texas has discovered one of the many objectionable features of his bill, but even if that is eliminated he will have to go farther in order to remove insuperable objection, and provide that the petition for a discharge shall be filed, not in the district or State or Territory where the debtor happens to reside at the time of filing, but in the district court of the district where he resided at the time when he made his assignment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the unconstitutional provisions contained in this bill. The bill is unconstitutional as it stands, and it seems to me that any good lawyer must recognize the correctness of that proposition. What is to guide and control? No assignments are to be recognized, no debtor claiming the benefits of this act is to be recognized, unless he makes an assignment which is valid by the laws of the State or Territory in which he resides or of the District of Columbia if he resides in such District. Those are the only petitioners who are to be recognized under the law.

Now, it would be possible for any State to defeat the operation of this bill in that State, and therefore the law would not establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. We have no assurance even that the system which it would establish would be uniform now, for the reason that we do not know that there are assignment laws in all of the States and Territories.

It may be that citizens will be compelled to move from one State to another in order to avail themselves of this law if enacted.

And how can a law be said to be uniform when it does not apply to all citizens of a certain class—of the class upon whom it is to operate or for whose benefit it is made? A law available to the gentleman from Texas and not to me under the same conditions is not uniform.

The assignment that the debtor makes must be valid by the laws of the State in which he lives, and also under this act. Suppose that State has no assignment law, then the debtor can not have the benefit of this act. Suppose this law is objectionable to the people or to the Legislature of some State where there is an assignment law, the Legislature may repeal that assignment law, leaving the State without such a law, and then no citizen of that State can take the benefit of the act.

Will any gentleman undertake to say that a general assignment for the benefit of creditors would be valid and binding whether there was an assignment law in the State or not? If any gentleman undertakes to say that, let me tell him that he is mistaken. There is no such thing as a valid general assignment for the benefit of creditors except by some statutory provision of the State or Territory.

It would be valid as between the assignor and the assignee, but the creditors of the assignor, the debtor, are not parties to such an assignment and are not bound by it, and they may go on and get their judgments and issue their executions and take the property away from the assignee in the absence of an assignment law, for the reason that they are not parties to the assignment and are not bound by it.

Every lawyer in the House will readily see, therefore, that this bill is unconstitutional on the face of it, for the reason that it does not provide a uniform system of bankruptcy and also because it may be made inoperative and unavailing in any State of this Union. No law of that character can justly be considered a uniform law. No bankruptcy law can be considered uniform unless the United States has the power to enforce it in all the States of the Union at the will of the petitioning creditor.

No one will assume for a moment that any other kind of a law than that would be constitutional or ought to be enacted. Again it may be impossible to have assignments valid under the State laws and also under this act, and do we propose that property in a State having no general assignment law shall be disbursed under the laws of some other State.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. RAY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RITCHIE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. RAY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, of course it is quite impossible to discuss the question of a bankrupt law in the space of five minutes. I wish to say, however, that I am earnestly in favor of a proper system of bankruptcy being adopted by this Congress, such a system as is proposed in what is known as the Torrey bill. The great objection to the pending bill is that it is entirely one-sided. It simply gives the debtor the right to apply for a discharge from his obligations, while it utterly ignores the rights of the creditor. Now, sir, in England there has been a bankruptcy system in force for more than 300 years. It has become a part of their commercial system, and under it the rights of creditors and debtors are equally protected and preserved.

All the experience we have had in this country on this subject has been under bankruptcy legislation which recognizes the right of the creditor as well as the debtor. The greatest objection urged in the deliberations of the committee on this subject on the part of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and those who agree with him in favor of this bill, has been that the involuntary system of bankruptcy opened a great door for fraud. Now, under the act of 1867, so far as my observation went, nine-tenths of all the frauds that were perpetrated were perpetrated on the part of the debtor, who sought this discharge by his own voluntary petition.

The creditors of a bankrupt are interested financially in husbanding and preserving the assets of the debtor. There is little danger, therefore, that they will adopt a course of proceeding which will sacrifice those assets. On the other hand, in the case of a petitioning debtor and under a system that ignores the rights of a creditor, the door of fraud is wide open for the debtor to manage his assets in such a way that his creditors can realize nothing whatever from the proceeding. It will be noticed, sir, that this bill makes no absolute payment of a percentage necessary to a discharge. All that the debtor has to do is to proceed under a State law and make an assignment; and four months after that make application to a district court for his discharge, which must be granted, provided his assignment has been according to the provisions of the State law. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, we should go slowly in any proposition that opens the door to such a system of fraud as this bill provides for.

Mr. RAY. I yield six minutes to the gentleman fron Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the report presented by the committee refers truthfully to three periods in the history of this country during which we have had a bankrupt law; and it truthfully states that no legislation was ever on our statute books that became so unpopular and so unsatisfactory as did this.

The first bankrupt law was passed in 1800, and it did not live two years. The second was passed in 1841, and so unpopular did it become that the same Congress which passed it repealed it. The bankrupt act of 1867 was passed just after the close of the war, and yet Congress began at once to change it and amend it to meet the popular will. The House at one time passed a bill repealing it, which the Senate did not concur in. Finally, upon the recommendation of President Grant, in one of his messages, the obnoxious legislation was wiped from the statute books.

A moment's reflection will show that there is reason for the unpopularity of such legislation. I claim that it is an utter impossibility to give this country a uniform bankrupt law that will survive longer than a very few years. We are so constituted that we have forty-four, and soon shall have forty-seven, different legislative bodies that are constantly passing laws. We are not in the same condition as England, where all the laws are made by a single legislative body. This Congress, if it tries, can not pass a satisfactory bankrupt law. I defy it to pass a bankrupt law that will be satisfactory to the country. Congress never has been able to do this, and in my judgment many, many years will be passed before it will be able to do it.

I am opposed to any bankrupt law. I believe it would be a great mistake to pass any bankrupt law at this period. In the first place, the condition of the country is not such as to demand a bankrupt law at this time. We are gradually getting out of the troubled waters of commercial disaster and misfortune. We are gradually getting into a better condition financially. Trade is improving. A bankrupt law should never be passed in this country except upon the heels of some great national distress ranging over a period of years, like the late civil war. There is no occasion which demands the passage of a bankrupt law at this time.

This bill in my judgment is less objectionable than the Torrey bill; but any bill is objectionable. Take for instance one feature of the law. All over the country we have little merchants who have been nursing their credit, whose creditors have been carrying them along during our late financial depression. Now if you pass this bill the people who will take advantage of it will rush into court; their property will become the subject of sale at auction; and every little merchant in our towns and villages will have to compete with the marshal or with the trustee who exposes the property of bankrupts for sale.

Take a shoe store, or a dry goods store, or a grocery store. Suppose its proprietor makes an assignment under this bill. The goods could immediately be put on sale at auction. People will purchase then because they are sold without regard to cost at a forced sale for whatever they will bring. A neighbor of the bankrupt who happens to be engaged in the same business can not compete in selling property at such prices. Thus you injure and depress trade; you embarrass people who might tide through. Instead of improving the condition of things you make more bankrupts.

Then there is another very serious objection. Under this bill a man, we will suppose, makes an assignment under the laws of his State. Then he presents his petition to the United States court. What does this court do? At the end of three months the man presents a petition for a discharge. Then the United States court sits and traverses the act of the State court to determine whether the assignment has been in accordance with the laws of the State, to determine whether the bankrupt has given up all his property. Thus the United States court will sit in judgment and review the action of the State court to determine whether the bankrupt is entitled to his discharge.

It will be remembered that under the act of 1867 there was a great diversity of ruling on the part of the judges of the district courts after the law was passed. No two of them construed the law like. It took a long time to get uniformity of decision. If this bill should pass our district judges will differ in their views of its construction. You will have a medley and confusion of tongues; and if the bill should be enforced for only the two years provided by its terms it will be absolutely impossible to get a uniform ruling or a uniform settlement of a debtor's assets under the bill. No earthly good can come of it. Nothing whatever except confusion and interference with trade, diverting the channels of trade and interfering with credit can come from such a bill as this. A bankruptcy bill, if passed at all, should be one adopted after very serious consideration and careful preparation. The idea that in three hours' time of passing a general bankruptcy bill to apply to all this great country, in view of the history of the past legislation pertaining to bankruptcy is, in my judgment, a piece of the highest folly, and certainly I trust this House will not do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, has the other side exhausted all of the time to which it was entitled?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has used only ten minutes of his time.

Mr. RAY. Then I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has four minutes and the gentleman from Texas has twenty minutes remaining.

[Mr. BAILEY withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas has any different bill from the one I have before me I should like to see it, and I should like to know by what sort of legerdemain it ever got into this House.

Mr. BROSIUS. You will find it in his report.

Mr. RAY. If there is any such bill before the House it should be printed and in the hands of members.

Mr. BROSIUS. You will find it on page 4 of the majority report.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, in the four minutes that remain to me, or, indeed, in the one hour that has been allowed for the discussion of this bill, it is of course absolutely impossible to point out all the defects of such a measure or to explain adequately its operation. It is sufficient for me to say now in opposing this bill that I fully concur in the views of the minority presented by the able lawyer from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON], in which he argues not only against the advisability of this bill and its injustice, but asserts that it is unconstitutional, that it is not a bankruptcy bill, asserts that it will not apply to the debtors of the whole country, asserts that small debtors must, but that large ones need not, apply for its benefits, asserts that the protection of servants and laborers is incomplete, asserts that the bill is imperfect as to discharges, asserts that no limitation of time as to applications for discharge is contained in it, asserts that a discharge may be improperly granted or withheld under this proposed law, asserts that certain debtors ought not to be, but will be, discharged under its operations; asserts that under it jurisdiction is to be exercised by both State and Federal courts, which is inconsistent; asserts that under this proposed law there is and will be a conflict between the State and the Federal law and the laws of the different States; asserts that it will entail a needless and an enormous expense; asserts that the creditors of the debtor would not have the ability to traverse the distances necessary in order to present their objections to the discharge, as they might be dragged from one jurisdiction to another; asserts that the bill ought not to be limited to two years, and so on. I have not the time to specify all the objections presented by that able report.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know perfectly well that it is absolutely futile for a Republican to talk to the Democratic side of this House. When you get your heads set, gentlemen, it does not make any difference where you are to be led, or into what kind of a pit you are to fall, you will "go it blind" when a Democrat is in the lead, regardless of consequences. But I want to call your attention, in protest against the passage of this bill, to the fact that Judge WOLVERTON, of Pennsylvania—and there is no better lawyer on your side of the House, in Congress, or, I may say, out of Congress—has presented the defects of this bill and the objections to it in a manner that ought to command attention. I wish to say to you further, that if you pass this bill here it will never, in my judgment, be entertained for one minute by the Senate, but if the Senate does entertain it and does confirm your action by enacting this bill into a law, the bill will rise up to condemn you among the merchants and the business men of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew the request which I made a while ago that gentlemen who have spoken on this bill in general debate be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. Is it in order to offer an amendment by way of a substitute to both the original bill and the substitute proposed for the original bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the time for general debate has expired, and the bill will now have to be read by paragraphs. After it has been read by paragraphs it will be in order to offer a substitute, but it is not in order at present.

Mr. POWERS. I desire to offer a substitute not only for the bill, but also for the substitute of the gentleman from Texas; that is, I desire to have mine supplant both the original and the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be offered at the close of the amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole. There are a number of committee amendments to the bill pending, and the Chair suggests to the gentleman from Texas that possibly it would be well to agree to them, in order that the text may be perfected before the Clerk proceeds to read the bill by paragraphs. If there be no objection, therefore, the amendments offered by the committee, and which have been reported, will be voted upon in gross.

Mr. RAY. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from New York what possible objection he sees to the course suggested by the Chair?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will see that these amendments will be pending as each paragraph is read, and will have to be voted upon before amendments that may be offered on the floor, thus consuming time and perhaps excluding the consideration of other amendments.

Mr. RAY. Let me see if I understand the situation. As I understand it, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] presents here certain amendments which he claims to be amendments of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I object to that form of statement. The report shows that they are the amendments of the committee.

Mr. RAY. Very good.

Mr. BAILEY. I "claim" nothing——

Mr. RAY. Then there are certain amendments contained in the report?

Mr. BAILEY. That is what they are.

Mr. RAY. In the second report?

Mr. BAILEY. In the report which the committee authorized.

Mr. RAY. Well, now, I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. BAILEY. There are a great many things you do not understand.

Mr. RAY. Very good; but the gentleman will gain nothing by that form or manner of address. The "gentleman from New York" is not to be intimidated.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not seeking to do anything of the kind; but in common decency no member has any right to stand on this floor and talk about what another "claims" to be the fact when the report submitted to the House shows that these are the amendments which the committee agreed to.

Mr. RAY. There was no offense intended to the very tender-hearted and tender-shinned gentleman from Texas. I simply had not had the honor of seeing any of the proposed amendments; and I do not find any yet.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, here is a copy of the report.

Mr. RAY. But I do find in the report entitled "Part 2," the "supplemental report"——

Mr. BAILEY. Here is a copy of the report which I send to the gentleman.

Mr. RAY. I do find in "Report 206, part 2" this statement:

> The committee submit as an appendix to the foregoing report a copy of the bill in the form in which they shall ask its passage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this being the second report, the latest report from the committee—it is a substitute for all prior action of the committee—is to be regarded as the latest action of the committee and as embodying the bill which they submit for action.

Now, I may be wrong in that. I submit to the ruling of the Speaker; and if necessary I will send to the desk——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not examined the report, but supposes the reports were regularly made.

Mr. RAY. There is the first report; and here is the second. There is no doubt they were regularly made.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to make an explanation about that matter. I made in the first instance the report indicating simply the amendments which the committee had adopted. I was afterwards informed that the minority of the committee intended to submit a report, and upon that information I submitted a second or supplemental report myself. If I had not been informed that the minority intended to submit a report, I should have been content with the report as at first submitted.

Mr. RAY. Then, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I was not out of order nor discourteous when I, as the gentleman supposed, intimated that there was something here before this House that was not the action of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary——

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to know what it is?

Mr. RAY. Because the gentleman now says that "Report No. 206" is the action of the majority of the committee and that the "supplemental report to bill H. R. 4609"—Report 206, part 2"—is his own individual act.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not true, because I submitted it to the committee, every one of those who favored the bill; and they all read and approved it.

Mr. RAY. Very good.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that this matter is settled on the face of the papers. The report which contains the amendments was made December 12, 1893. That report contains the amendments which are also contained in the calendar bill reported at the same time. Now, it seems that on January 4, 1894, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] submitted a supplemental report. But the amendments of the committee are in the first report of the committee and also in the body of the bill.

Mr. RAY. This second report—if it be the report of the committee, and the gentleman says it is—states that—

> The committee submit, as an appendix to the foregoing report, a copy of the bill in the form in which they shall ask its passage.

Now what does that mean? Is that a substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the bill reported with certain committee amendments which have been read by the Clerk.

Mr. RAY. Then a parliamentary inquiry. Is this not a proposition on the part of the committee to submit a substitute for the original bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. This is the same bill, but there are a number of amendments recommended by the committee, which have been read by the Clerk. The Chair will submit the request whether the amendments shall be voted upon in gross or not.

Mr. RAY. Before that let me ask, if these amendments are voted upon in gross and accepted, then, as I understand it, we take up the bill with the amendments in, and read it by sections, and the whole bill as amended is then open to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably.

Mr. RAY. Very good; I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then, if there be no further objection the amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary will be voted upon in gross.

There being no objection, the amendments were considered and agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the first section of the bill as amended, and it will then be open to amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BOATNER. Before that, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman in charge of the bill stated that he intended to offer a substitute for the bill. I ask unanimous consent that that substitute be now offered, and that it be read by sections for amendment instead of the original bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry before consent is given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is the bill now before the House, which has bust been amended by the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary, to be considered in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. The bill, let me say to the gentleman, is precisely the bill which the committee ordered to be reported. The bill was introduced, went to the committee, and they adopted certain amendments and ordered the bill to be reported with the amendments. I reported the bill in conformity with that order of the committee.

Now, instead of asking the House to vote on that bill, which the committee reported, I find that there are certain verbal changes necessary, and this morning I redrafted the bill, preserving all of the committee amendments and virtually making merely verbal changes in the bill itself. That bill, which I have so redrafted, is what I call the substitute. It contains practically and essentially the features of the pending bill, and all of the committee amendments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then the bill you propose to offer is not that indicated in the latter part of this report?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all, although it does not differ from it in principle. There are, as I have said, some verbal changes that I find necessary.

Mr. BOATNER. My request was for unanimous consent that the substitute itself be offered now and be read by sections for amendment in lieu of the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman that this substitute bill be now offered, to be considered by sections, and be open to amendment and debate under the rule.

Mr. RAY. Before that request is submitted permit me a word. A few moments ago the question was up of adopting certain amendments to the bill which was then before the House. These amendments were reported and adopted. That was done on motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and I inquired if the bill, with these amendments, would be before the House for consideration. In response to that the Chair stated that that would be the course pursued.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wants to state, however, that he did not know at the time that the gentleman from Texas intended to offer a substitute.

Mr. RAY. The inquiry I wish to make is this: As the gentleman from Texas has offered his amendments to the bill as it was before the House, and has procured their adoption, is it still in order now for him to move a substitute for the bill as amended on his own motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that instead of going on and perfecting the bill now before the House, that the gentleman may offer his substitue, and let action be taken on that; that is, consider it by paragraphs for amendment.

The Chair stated that it could not be done without unanimous consent. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to substitute that bill for the pending one. If that is done, it is a proposed substitute; it would be read by paragraphs, aad each paragraph would be open to amendment. Now the gentleman makes that request for unanimous consent to substitute that bill.

Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the substitute is considered by unanmious consent, does that prevent my colleague, Judge POWERS, from offering his substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not. He could offer it at the close of the two hours' debate as a substitute for the bill, provided the House has at that time concluded the consideration of the bill. The gentleman will remember that the special rule only allows two hours for the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule; and if the House should exhaust all the time in the consideration of one or two amendments, and have not concluded the final reading of the bill, the Chair thinks there would be some doubt about the right to offer a substitute.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. My difficulty was as to this question, whether a substitute could be offered for a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It could only be by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What I want to know is, whether the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], will have to obtain unanimous consent to have his substitute considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He would not have to do so as against this bill, because this, if substituted by unanimous consent, would become the original bill, the Chair thinks.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It would not be regarded as a substitute, then?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BOATNER. The substitute is the committee bill as amended, with verbal changes, as has been stated by the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman to say it is substantially the same bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I undertake to say that no gentleman will object to any change that has been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will now submit the request for unanimous consent to substitute the bill now offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. RAY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry in regard to the situation to see if I understand it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAY. As I understand it, if this unanimous consent is given, then the substitute will take the place of the present bill, and will be before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be read by paragraphs.

Mr. RAY. That bill will be read by paragraphs and be considered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. RAY. Now, what I want to understand is, whether or not, at the close of the two hours debate, or of the time that we may have before voting on the proposition, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] will have the floor, will have the right of way to offer his substitute as a substitute for this bill which is to come in by unanimous consent, if unanimous consent is given?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already stated that if the House concludes the consideration of the pending bill within the two hours, the Chair thinks that a substitute might be offered; but the rule provides that at the end of two hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and that would exclude the substitute, the bill not having been read through for amendment by paragraphs.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, allow me to make one more parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If the substitute which is offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is not allowed to come in by unanimous consent—if unanimous consent is withheld—then the substitute of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] would not be in order, would it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would only be in order in the event the House concludes the consideration of the pending bill within the two hours.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, I know; but suppose we refuse unanimous consent to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas, then there would be one substitute in order, which may be adopted in the consideration of the bill. That being the case, another substitute could not be offered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It could not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Now I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] a question, whether the substitute he proposes to offer is the Torrey bill?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then I object to the unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the Clerk will proceed to read the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That if any debtor owing $200 or more shall execute an assignment or cession of his property, valid by the laws of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which he may reside or be domiciled, or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof, and also in accordance with the requirements of this act, it shall have the effect hereinafter provided for.

Mr. BROSIUS. I move to strike out the words "or cession" in the fourth line of the first section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, section 1, strike out the words "or cession'

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I will state to him that those two words are inserted in the bill in order to cover the laws of the State of Louisiana, which denominate insolvency proceedings in that State as a cession of property. It is a civil law term, which has exactly the same meaning as an assignment at the common law. Those words were inserted on my motion, so as to make the bill cover the insolvency laws of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. BROSIUS. Do you not use the word "assignment?"

Mr. BOATNER. No, sir.

Mr. BROSIUS. It is not used at all?

Mr. BOATNER. The word "assignment" is used there when an individual assigns a right, or makes an assignment, in common parlance, but the giving up of property in satisfaction of debts is denominated, in the laws of Louisiana, as a cession of property.

Mr. BROSIUS. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] will give me the honor of his attention for a moment, I will avail myself of an opportunity to ask a question in relation to the bill. I understood the gentleman from Texas to say that all existing rights of creditors remained unimpaired. I find in the bill that if an attachment is levied on a debtor's property, and an assignment is subsequently made, that attachment is vacated. Now, to that extent, therefore, it would seem that the existing right of the creditor is denied him.

Mr. BAILEY. I stated that in response to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. BROSIUS. Am I not correct?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly you are.

Mr. BROSIUS. Then, an attachment levied by a creditor is vacated by an assignment by a debtor.

Mr. BAILEY. It may be; yes.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, it is under the terms of the bill. Now, I want to inquire whether any other right of the creditor, now existing, under any of the laws of the States, in the nature of an executionary process, is interfered with by this bill, supposing it should become a law; that is to say, in Pennsylvania when we have obtained a judgment we issue an execution and levy upon the property. Does the bill interfere in any way with that?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. In other words, the bill expressly provides that it shall be for the benefit of all creditors and subject to all valid liens.

Mr. BROSIUS. But it is not for the benefit of all creditors when it vacates a legal attachment which the creditor has already levied upon the debtor's property.

Mr. MALLORY. That is a valid lien.

Mr. BROSIUS. But it vacates it, as I understand.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a provision of the bill, and it is the only way to affect it. Originally I said it did not affect any right the creditor enjoys; but that must be considered in connection with my statement in response to the gentleman from Louisiana. Now, as to all other things, they stand precisely on the same ground in the bill as they did before the bill.

Mr. BROSIUS. But that does not affect attachment liens.

Mr. BAILEY. Under the attachment laws it does not.

Mr. BROSIUS. But it seems to have been affected.

Mr. BAILEY. It may be, if the debtor fails in his petition.

Mr. BROSIUS. Can either of my friends from Texas or Louisiana assign a reason for affecting an attachment——

Mr. BAILEY. Why certainly.

Mr. BROSIUS. Divesting a lien that has accrued to a creditor in the enjoyment of his legal right?

Mr. BAILEY. This was to prevent collusive attachments. I am free to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I had some doubts on the question myself, but upon conference with the gentleman from Louisiana, who has had large experience in commercial law practice, he insisted that the real difficulty in all these cases was collusive attachments—that the debtor, if the bill should pass without that provision, would suffer a favored creditor, or one related to him, to attach the property of the creditor, which would absorb the estate and he would pay the others in a certificate of the court.

Now, the committee sought to find a way out of that difficulty. It would not do to say if he was attached he should not have the benefit of the law, and stop there, for a vindictive creditor might attach him and prevent him from ever having the benefit of the law. Now, there was a way, and only one way, to let him have the benefit of it, if he was honestly attached, and defeat him if he was dishonestly attached, and that was that he would have to show that it was an honest attachment before he could get the benefit of the law.

Mr. BROSIUS. Is there no way of making a distinction between honest and collusive attachments?

Mr. BAILEY. There is a difference in the opinion of many members; and if the gentleman will recollect, a great many of the States of the Union have provided (I think that Illinois has provided) that when a creditor attaches that brings all the property in for pro rata distribution among all the creditors; and I am told that in those States where it has been tried it has worked most excellent results.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, I will state that the change of the law which he thinks is made by this provision of the bill is purely imaginary. The circuit court of the United States have held and it is now stare decisis that an assignment for the benefit of the creditor made under the State laws dissolves all attachments. That is settled jurisprudence.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOATNER. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BROSIUS. I withdraw my amendment, as the explanation has been satisfactory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question. He may have explained it before and I did not hear him. The question is, why is the operation of this bill confined to two years?

Mr. BAILEY. I will be glad to answer that when we reach it.

Mr. PICKLER. It may bear on some other sections of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that question I would simply say this, that all the bankruptcy laws which this country has ever had have been unsatisfactory. This the friends of the bill deem an experiment. The experience under the last law was that it took six years to repeal it after the public became satisfied that it ought to be repealed.

The House repealed it twice before the Senate consented; and finally, the last time, so overwhelming was the sentiment in favor of its repeal that the House voted it by a vote of 205 to 41 and the Senate voted it by 38 to about 16.

Now, with the experience we have had with other bills, it was thought easier to renew it, if it was good, than to repeal it if it was bad; and it being an experiment, because we never before had a purely voluntary system, we thought we would frame it in such a way that if it did no good it certainly could not do very much harm, because of its limited existence.

Mr. McCALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas whether this bill abrogates existing State insolvency laws?

Mr. BAILEY. It does not.

Mr. McCALL. Then in those States where they have involuntary insolvency laws this bill would not prevent an application by the creditor under those laws?

Mr. BAILEY. The bill provides that if a man has done certain things he may go into the Federal courts and get his discharge. Now, if the State laws do not permit him to do those things, that is a matter between him and his State.

Mr. McCALL. In States where they have insolvent laws providing for involuntary insolvency, as we have in Massachusetts, would those laws be operative while your bill was in force?

Mr. BAILEY. I think undoubtedly they would, unless they conflicted, and the bill is so drawn that there could not possibly be any conflict, because whatever is done under it must be valid according to the law of the State and then according to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. McCALL. Then, for instance, if the creditors of a debtor in Massachusetts were satisfied that he was defrauding them, they could make their application to our insolvency court under the State law, notwithstanding the existence of this Federal law?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly; and if they took him in under your State insolvency laws he would have to stay there.

Mr. POWERS. I think the gentleman from Texas is falling into an error in the answer he is making to the gentleman from Massachusetts. It has been held by the Supreme Court, if I am not greatly mistaken—it certainly has been held by several State courts—that where Congress fails to legislate on the subject of bankruptcy, State laws on that subject may be passed, but that if Congress undertakes to exercise its power, that suspends any such power on the part of the State. So that in this case, as Congress is now legislating on the subject, the State law of Massachusetts, to which the gentleman [Mr. McCALL] has referred, would be inoperative.

Mr. BAILEY. But this law recognizes State legislation.

Mr. POWERS. But the moment Congress legislates at all on the subject of bankruptcy its action suspends all State power to legislate on the subject, and therefore necessarily suspends the force of the involuntary insolvency laws of Massachusetts.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Vermont will recall the fact that in the very case where the Supreme Court said that the action of Congress vacated all State laws it yet sustained an assignment under the laws of Maryland. It said that it did, but it held that it did not vacate all State laws.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word of the preceding section. In answer to the criticisms made by gentlemen on the other side, I want to say that the very object of this bill is to carry into effect and to give complete vitality to the insolvency laws of the several States. Under existing conditions the courts of no State can give a discharge from the payment of debts due to persons who reside outside of the jurisdiction of the State, and therefore the insolvent laws of the several States are entirely ineffective. They have territorial effect within the borders of the several States, but it can be of no benefit to the debtor to obtain a discharge from creditors who reside in his own State if his property still remains subject to the claims of creditors who reside outside of the State.

Under the provisions of this bill the debtor who has made a surrender or an assignment of his property according to the law of the State where he resides, making no unlawful preferences, doing nothing which contravenes the laws of the State, turning over his property less his legal exemptions to the officer provided by the law of the State, for distribution among his creditors—the debtor who has done this may go into the Federal court and supplement the discharge which the State court is authorized to give him by a discharge from the Federal court which will be operative against all creditors whatever. That, as I understand, is the principle upon which the bill is founded, and it appears to me that it is not subject to the criticisms which gentlemen by their inquiries have seemed to pass upon it.

Now, as to whether or not the Supreme Court will hold that the bill establishes a uniform system of bankruptcy, when it does not provide for any liquidation or distribution of bankrupt estates by the Federal courts, that is a question upon which at this time I am not prepared to express an opinion; but if the court does hold that the bill is constitutional in that respect, it seems to me that otherwise it is unobjectionable. If the insolvent laws of the State do not do justice between the creditor and the debtor, that is a matter for the State Legislature, and when Congress has supplemented the authority of the discharge which the State gives by a discharge from the Federal court, all creditors will know that they must go into the Federal courts to protect their rights, and the bill will operate as a uniform bankruptcy law.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentlemon from Texas in charge of this bill a question, and as the basis of it I will take his own State. In Texas I believe you have assignment laws.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And those laws provide that there shall be no preferences?

Mr. BAILEY. The assignment law does so provide, but we still hold that there may be a preference by a deed of trust.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then, by a deed of trust you avoid that law with reference to preferences. In Texas, then, as I understand, a debtor will get up deeds of trust and dispose of his property by preferences, and then he will go into the State court and make a voluntary assignment of what he has left. Then he can go into the State court and make a voluntary assignment of what is left, can he not?

Mr. BAILEY. If he does, he can not get a discharge under this bill.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Wait a moment. That is not certain. Suppose there has been under the State law a deed of trust conveying the property? Do you provide that the creditors can come into the Federal court and have that held invalid which by the State law was valid?

Mr. BAILEY. The bill provides that if such an act be done the debtor shall not be acquitted. If the gentleman will read the bill.——

Mr. NORTHWAY. I have done so; and what I want to find out is this: Take your own State; suppose, in the absence of any bill of this kind, a debtor, under a deed of trust, disposes of his property and afterward makes an assignment; does that set aside his deed of trust?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The deed of trust is still valid, is it not?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Now, suppose the debtor under your State law, executes in the first place a deed of trust, and afterward makes anassignment for the purpose of taking advantage of this bill; does that set aside the deed of trust?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir; as a dishonest debtor, the man fails to get a discharge.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Not a "dishonest debtor." He disposes of his property according to the laws of your State.

Mr. BAILEY. But he undertakes to prefer one creditor over another, which this bill provides shall not be done; or if it is done that there shall be no discharge.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But how can that which has been done lawfully under State law be unlawful under the Federal law?

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will consider the matter a moment he will understand this distinction. This is a bill extending benefactions; these are extended on certain conditions, the main condition being that the creditors of the bankrupt shall participate fairly in the division of his estate.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But the question I want to ask is this—are you providing that the Federal court may hold that to be unlawful which a State court holds to be lawful?

Mr. BAILEY. It is not unlawful, but it is provided that if that be done the debtor shall not have his discharge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. BROSIUS. I move to amend by striking out after the word "reside," in line 6 of section 1, the words "or be domiciled;" so as to read:

in which he may reside, or if he have property, etc.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BROSIUS.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this amendment meets the approval of the gentleman in charge of this bill; but before I take my seat I wish to ask him a question, and that is whether an assignment under this bill, if it should become a law, would supersede an assignment under the State law? Suppose, for instance, under a Pennsylvania statute which does not provide for any discharge, I make an assignment of my property for the benefit of my creditors, and subsequently I make an assignment under the provisions of this act. What becomes of my first assignment?

Mr. BAILEY. There is no assignment under the provisions of this act. The bill simply provides that the act of assignment must be lawful under the laws of the State, and must also conform to the requirements of this bill, which looks simply to an equal division of the property among the creditors.

Mr. BROSIUS. Exactly. Now, two things must concur to make a valid assignment under this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Not to make a valid assignment; but two things must concur in order to secure the discharge of the debtor.

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly, that is what we are talking about; because an assignment without a discharge will be of no earthly consequence to the debtor. But I say two things must concur: First, it must be in conformity with the State statute; secondly, it must conform to the requirements of this act; otherwise a debtor can not obtain his discharge. Suppose I make an assignment which conforms to the statute of my State, without intending to obtain a discharge; but I subsequently conceive the idea that I may gain something by proceeding under this statute of the United States and I make another assignment which conforms to the law of my State and also to the requirements of the United States statute? What becomes of the first assignment? Is it superseded?

Mr. BAILEY. If the first assignment violates the requirements of this act in any way the debtor will have done something tending to defeat the equal distribution of his estate; and when he comes into the Federal court asking for a discharge from his indebtedness he will be denied it, because his own act previously performed has defeated it.

Mr. BROSIUS. That is a complete answer to my inquiry. Now, I ask a vote on my amendment, which, I believe, meets the approbation of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 2 was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That such assignment shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides, and shall convey all of the estate of the debtor except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution and liability for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, subject to all valid liens, except with the preference hereinafter allowed. It shall contain a list of the names and residences of all his creditors, and a schedule of his property exempt and unexempt from execution, and the amount due to each creditor. It shall also contain a statement of the liens or other incumbrances upon his property, all of which shall be verified by the oath of the debtor to be correct, the property so assigned or surrendered shall be administered and distributed among creditors according to the laws of the State where the debtor resides, subject to the provisions of this act.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out—I have not the amended bill before me and can not get a copy, having been informed that there were none to be had—but I move to strike out the words that I suppose must be in lines 1 or 2 of the printed bill—

Shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides.

And substitute in lieu of them the words:

Shall be made in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Now, I desire the attention of every thoughtful and considerate man on this subject.

What do you propose to do under the provisions of this bill as it stands? The assignment is to be made "in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides." Now, take this case: The debtor who makes the assignment resides in the State of New York. He has property in the State of New York and also in the State of Illinois and in the State of Indiana. But you propose to have him convey that property in accordance with the laws of the State of New York. Then what is to happen? Are you going to leave him there?

This bill, as it now stands, leaves the assignor there. He chooses the trustee. This is a United States law; then, under this bill this man owning property in New York and residing there, having property in Illinois and in Indiana and creditors in each of these States, appoints an assignee in New York who goes into your State of Illinois and your State of Indiana and takes the property there situate, converts it into money and takes the proceeds to New York to be there administered under the assignment laws of New York, regardless of the rights of creditors living in the State of Illinois and regardless of the rights of creditors living in the State of Indiana or any other State where such property may be found.

How are such creditors to be protected? Where and how are they to get their rights? Who is to protect them? Who is to control the disposition of this property and where is it to be done? Under the laws of Indiana? Under the laws of Illinois? In the courts of those two States? No, but in the courts of the State of New York where the debtor lives and where he made his assignment.

I ask you gentlemen from Indiana and you gentlemen from Illinois, you gentlemen from the great commercial States and cities of the United States, whether you are prepared to give your assent to any such proposition as this that will unsettle and overturn the entire commercial systems prevailing in your States? What protection have you or what rights are guaranteed to you by such a bill as this?

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not a fact that in all bankruptcy laws—and it was so provided in the Torrey bill, which I believe you supported——

Mr. RAY. No, sir; I did not support it.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, whether you did or not, is it not a fact that in all bankrupt laws it is provided that the bankrupt estate must be administered by the court having jurisdiction; that is to say, that court within whose jurisdiction the bankrupt resides? Is not that the case in all bankruptcy proceedings?

Mr. RAY. Yes, my friend; but here is a case——

Mr. KILGORE (continuing). You can not have an administration of a bankrupt estate in every State where the bankrupt happens to have property.

Mr. RAY. Let me answer your question first. Under the Torrey bill and all others that have been presented heretofore, the bankrupt act itself has attempted to provide the means and manner for the distribution of the estate of the bankrupt. It has made a general law on the subject.

Mr. KILGORE. Did it not provide the place where it should be administered, too?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. And did it not provide for the discharge of the petitioner in bankruptcy?

Mr. RAY. Certainly. But let me continue. I say each of these acts provided the mode and manner of the distribution of the estate by a general law. But what do you do in this act? You give this power to the State, and the United States courts will be called on to administer the assignment laws of the forty-four States. Heretofore, under our bankruptcy laws, there was a uniform method of procedure, which applied to all States alike, but here you have property taken from two or three different States, carried into one State because the assignor happens to live there, and have it distributed and divided according to the laws of that particular State, without regard to what may be the rights of the creditors in the other States under their State laws; so that the property of an insolvent debtor may be taken from New England, from New York, or Indiana, and carried away to Texas or Colorado to be administered under the laws of those particular States. That is the injustice, in part, of the bill now before us that I complain of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman form New York is altogether at fault in his criticism of this section. It provides:

2. That such assignment or cession shall be made in accordance with the laws of the State where the debtor resides, and shall convey all of the estate of the debtor except such as is exempt by the law of his domicile from execution and liability for his debts, and shall be for the equal benefit of all his creditors, subject to all valid liens, except with the preference hereinafter allowed.

That is to say that the person who seeks to avail himself of the provisions of this act must first have made an assignment or cession of the property for the benefit of his creditors; and it must be made according to the laws of the State wherein he resides, but in making it he must have conveyed to the assignee or person appointed to represent the creditors not only the property which he held there, but the property which he holds everywhere, in satisfaction of his obligations. The property which he may surrender in Illinois and the property in Indiana or elsewhere of course would be administered by the assignee or person appointed to represent the creditors in Illinois or Indiana, according to the laws of the particular State, or wherever the surrendered property happened to be—whether in Indiana or elsewhere. It would have to be administered exactly in accordance with the laws of the State where it is situate, providing the effect of judgments, liens, etc.

Mr. RAY. Now, under this law as it stands, if a man makes an assignment under the laws of the State of New York, and if he owns real estate and personal property in ten different States, the property will vest in the assignee. Now, do you claim that the property in each State would be administered according to the assignment laws of the State where that property was situated, or would it be administered under this bill according to the laws of the State where the assignee resided? Which?

Mr. BOATNER. As to the mere form of proceeding of administration, of course that would be controlled by the laws of the State where the surrender was made. But the rights of parties in relation to the property would be determined by the laws of the States where the property was situated. No law of New York could be held to control a lien in the State of Illinois, and vice versa.

Mr. RAY. Now let me ask you right there, would not the assignee in New York have a right to go into Illinois, or Indiana, or wherever he could find property, and convert it into money, and take the money proceeds of the property into the State of New York.

Mr. BOATNER. He certainly would, unless, according to the laws of Illinois or Indiana, there were liens upon the property which had not been satisfied.

Mr. RAY. Suppose there are no liens, but suppose the debtor has made fraudulent transfers, and people in the State of Indiana are seeking to set those aside. In comes the assignee from New York before the suit has been brought, before the man has an opportunity to assert his right, and converts the property into money and takes it away to the State of New York. What remedy has the man in Indiana? None whatever.

Mr. BOATNER. The man in Indiana would have a perfect right to go in the State of Illinois, or New York, as the case may be, and contest in those courts for the enforcement of his rights against the fund in the hands of the assignee, according to the laws of the State where the contract is made.

Mr. RAY. That is true; and right there is the injustice and folly of this bill, because I, being an assignee in New York, go into Illinois and take the property and carry it away, in the form of money, to New York, and the creditors in Illinois, seeking to enforce their rights, are compelled to follow me into the State of New York and see the property disposed of under the laws of New York. I do not believe anybody wants that done. No commercial man does. The property should be distributed according to a rule of law made by the United States, not by a single State of the forty-four.

Mr. BOATNER. The very identical condition of affairs which the gentleman now regards with so much horror was provided for by the Torrey bill. It was provided for by the bankruptcy bill of 1867, and, so far as I know, was provided for by every bankruptcy bill the country has ever had. Why, you can not have a separate bankruptcy administration in every State and locality where the property is situated. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] has suggested to me that the assignment is made under the law of the State where the assignment is made. That law can have no extraterritorial effect. The person appointed to represent the creditors has a certain representative capacity.

He may go into another State, and in his official capacity may obtain the possession of property. He may provoke the sale of property, but he must do so subject to the laws of that State, and subject to the rights of creditors of that State. If they stand by and permit him to reduce the property to cash and to convey it into another State, why there is no more hardship in those creditors being obliged to go to that State for the purpose of obtaining the ascertainment of their rights than there is for the creditor in New York who now goes to Louisiana or Texas, habitually, for the same purpose if his debtors happen to live there.

Mr. BROSIUS. I move to strike out in line 4——

Mr. RAY. I have not withdrawn my amendment. I call for a vote on my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The Chair will submit the question on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that that amendment be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I think we might have some time if there is any disposition to discuss it. This is a committee amendment, and I did not feel at liberty to leave it out of the substitute that I prepared, but I think it is entirely covered by the first section of the bill, which provides that the assignment shall be valid according to the laws of the State.

Mr. RAY. Where is that?

Mr. BAILEY. In the first section of the bill—or if he have property in any other jurisdiction, then as to such property, valid according to the laws thereof.

Now, as to personal property in a different jurisdiction, it is conveyed by the law, conforming to the law of the assignor's domicile or residence.

Mr. RAY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes on this subject here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MALLORY. I object.

Mr. RAY. Let us understand this before we go further.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not care anything further about debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair does not know whether the committee amendments have all been agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee have amendments to offer. I asked unanimous consent that the amendments of the committee be agreed to in gross, and the gentleman from New York objected. He desires now to submit some amendments.

Mr. RAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. "The gentleman from New York" did not object.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, then, I renew my request.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the committee amendments were all agreed to.

Mr. BOATNER. What was objected to was that the substitute be considered as pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAY. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 39.

Mr. RAY. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 69.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BRODERICK. Can we have the amendment of the gentleman from New York reported again? There are members present who do not understand what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, and at the request of the gentleman from Kansas, the amendment of the gentleman from New York will again be reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 22, nays 135, answered "present" 9, not voting 185; as follows:

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will note the names of those who are present and not voting; and on this call gentlemen whose names are called by the Clerk can vote.
The Clerk read as follows:
Mr. BELTZHOOVER, Mr. BRANCH, Mr. BUNDY, Mr. CURTIS of New York, Mr. IKIRT, Mr. LESTER, Mr. MAHON, Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota, Mr. PATTERSON, Mr. RICHARDS, and Mr. CHARLES W. STONE.

Mr. BAILEY. He is sitting right over here.
Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. I was present and not voting, because I was paired.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon this question the tellers report—yeas 22, nays 134, answering present 7, and the tellers note the presence of 11, making in all 174 gentlemen. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The doors will now be closed and the Clerk will call the names of gentlemen who failed to respond on the first call. Upon this call excuses will be in order.
Mr. BOWERS (when the name of Mr. LOUD was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr LOUD, be excused as he has gone home sick.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
Mr. PAYNE (when the name of Mr STORER was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. STORER be excused on account of illness in his family.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
The call was completed.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon this call 205 gentlemen have answered to their names, more than a quorum.
Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order by which the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the gentleman from New York be vacated.
Mr. RAY. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The gentleman will state it.
Mr. RAY. I wish to inquire whether under the order adopted this morning we are not required to vote on this bill at half past 4 o'clock to-day?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the order.
The Clerk read the order as above printed.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised that under the order the time expires at twenty minutes to 5. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time of the adoption of the order, but that is the record at the desk. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that the order by which the yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment of the gentleman from New York be vacated?
Mr. RAY. I object.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Texas. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York; the tellers will take their places at the desk, and the Clerk will call the roll.
The Clerk proceeded to call the roll and completed the first call.
Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hour for taking the vote has arrived, I again ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas, pending the second call, asks unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order is vacated, the amendment is rejected, and the previous question now operates on the bill and amendments to its passage.
Mr. BAILEY. The amendment of the gentleman from New York was voted down, and the order for the yeas and nays being vacated, I assume that the amendment has failed and that the gentleman withdraws the point of no quorum.
Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, the understanding to which I am willing to consent is this: That the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Texas or the majority of the committee shall be regarded as pending in lieu of the original bill, and that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] shall have the right by unanimous consent to offer his substitute for that bill; the vote to be taken on the substitute and then on the bill presented by the gentleman from Texas.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman from Texas state his proposition.
Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute which I shall offer shall be regarded and treated by the House as the original bill with amendments, and that for that substitute the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] or the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] shall have the privilege of offering the bill which they propose as a substitute.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to offer a bill as a substitute for the one now pending, the substitute to be treated as the original bill, and that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] be authorized to offer a substitute for that.
Mr. REED. Is that coupled with any proposition as to time for discussion?
Mr. BAILEY. This does not affect the discussion; there will be no discussion on either.
Mr. REED. It seems to me if we are going to have a bankruptcy bill we ought to have some discussion, especially if two new ones are to be brought in.
Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the gentleman that there are absolutely no changes except verbal changes in the bill which I now propose to offer as a substitute, to be treated as the original bill; and the bill which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] will offer as a substitute has been before the House heretofore, and was discussed for two weeks.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]?
Mr. HATCH. I would like to hear that request stated again.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to offer a substitute for the bill now pending, the substitute to be treated as the original bill; and he also asks that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] be permitted to offer a substitute.
Mr. HATCH. I object to any vote on the Torrey bill. We rejected it once; and that ought to be satisfactory to every gentleman.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering this bill to be engrossed and read the third time.
The question being put, there were on a division (called for by Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE)—ayes 91, noes 42.
Mr. RAY. No quorum.

Mr. BAILEY. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

Mr. RAY. Before this question is put, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The agreement was made that if consent was given for the bill of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to come in the bill of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] should be entertained as a substitute. Now, having been talking a moment with gentlemen on this side, I find a vote is about to be taken on the original bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Objection was made.

Mr. RAY. Then the agreement was not carried out?

Mr. BAILEY. It could not be by reason of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill which has been under consideration during the day.

Mr. RAY. Not the substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] objected to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY. Now I understand the matter.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken now by yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill, instead of on the engrossment and third reading.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; let us go on in accordance with the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from Maine. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] will act as tellers during the call of the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 55, answered "present" 1, not voting 172; as follows:

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The Clerk will report the names of those members who are reported by the tellers as present and not voting.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TURNER of Georgia, Mr. GEAR, Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota, Mr. CAMINETTI, and Mr. MCCALL.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order in regard to the report just read by the Clerk. I desire to say that Mr. GEAR was not within the range of my vision; that is, I did not see him. After the voting was all over and they were counting up the list I did see him, but not until after the call of the roll had been completed.

I do not know of course how the rule will be construed by the Chair; whether a member could only be noted as present when his name was called or not.

Mr. BAILEY. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that there was nobody within the range of the gentleman's vision. If you look at the roll kept by the gentleman you will see that he has not marked anybody as "present."

Mr. RAY. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, give me the tally sheet and I will prove that the gentleman did not. I make the statement that the gentleman did not mark any member as being present, and to prove it I hold in my hand the tally sheet, which does not show the name of any member marked upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York if he objects to any other name upon the list?

Mr. RAY. I do not; and I do not object to that. I only wished to call attention to it, so that we may have some construction——

Mr. BAILEY. Inasmuch as the gentleman from New York has challenged the fact of the presence of the gentleman from Iowa, permit me to say that the gentleman from Iowa is himself in the House, and I am sure he will not undertake to say that he was not present, talking to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE], while the roll was being called.

Mr. RAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to say that Mr. GEAR was not in this House during the roll call, but I can say, and I do say, and I think I have pretty fair eyes and I looked very carefully, that I did not see him during the call. I did not see him until after the roll call was entirely completed, and when they were counting up the number voting. Then the gentleman from Texas said, "There is the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]; put him down," or "count him." I said, "No; he was not here during the roll call."

Now, the fact that he was present immediately after the roll was called may entitle him to be recorded. I do not know as to that. But that is all I can say in regard to the matter.

Mr. BAILEY. As a matter of fact, I did not put the name of Mr. GEAR down until I saw him standing over there talking to the Senator from Ohio——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will again ask the gentleman from New York if there is any other name on the list to which he objects?

Mr. RAY. I do not object to any other, and I only raised that objection because of the circumstances connected with it. I do not know how the Chair will regard it, but it seems to me that the member named can only be marked as present at the time his name is reached on the roll.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the name of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], who is recorded as present, will be omitted from the list.

Mr. BAILEY. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a disagreement in the report of the tellers.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, during the latter part of the roll call Governor GEAR was talking——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not hearing evidence on the subject. If the gentleman will allow the Chair to proceed——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I am entirely willing the name shall be taken from the list, as it is not necessary to make the quorum; but I adhere to the statement I have made that Mr. GEAR was present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no issue raised by the Chair upon that question. The only question is whether there is objection to omitting the name from those announced as present and not voting, it not being necessary to make a quorum.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The bill was accordingly read the third time, the question being upon its passage.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. PAYNE, there were—ayes 106, noes 36.

Mr. WELLS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. WELLS and Mr. BAILEY were appointed tellers.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the point of no quorum.

Mr. WELLS. I will withdraw it so as to avoid detaining members here, but I do it with regret.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of no quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. PAYNE. I renew it.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. PAYNE and Mr. BAILEY as tellers at the desk.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a dispatch from my colleague, Mr. CORNISH of New Jersey, who wishes to be excused on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKLER. Pending the vote on the passage of the bill I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not at this time entertain that motion under the special rule.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 37, answered "present" 3, not voting 194; as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

For this day:

Mr. MAGNER with Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. HOUK], and hence have answered "present" instead of voting.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it is evident we can not obtain a quorum this evening, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, July 17, 1894.

Prayer by Rev. ISAAC W. CANTER, of the city of Washington.

On motion of Mr. CALL, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report by Capt. M. A. Healy, United States Revenue Cutter Service, concerning the rescue by the steamer Bear of nine men belonging to the crew of the wrecked bark James Allen, and recommending that an appropriation be made for the payment of the bills which were made necessary owing to the destitute and feeble condition of the rescued men; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TURPIE presented a memorial of the Yearly Meeting of Friends for New England, and a memorial of sundry citizens of Upland, Ind., remonstrating against the present system of sectarian Indian education receiving Government support, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the memorial of William Beatty, of Indianapolis, Ind., representing many thousand retail liquor dealers of the United States, remonstrating against an increase of the internal-revenue tax on whisky; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of 98 citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the support of the Government in maintaining the present system of sectarian Indian education, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PEFFER. I present the petition of William K. Tubman, of the city of Baltimore. The petitioner presents a peculiar case, and yet, after having examined it, I think it is a proper one to present to the Senate.

The petitioner shows that suits have been brought by him in the courts of the United States in several instances, beginning some years ago, for the purpose of preventing an infringement upon a patent which he had secured, and when his suit was brought the association known as the Eastern Railroad Association undertook to defend the suit he brought. He alleges that the Eastern Railroad Association had no interest whatever in the proceedings, but that there was connivance upon the part of certain railway companies to defeat action; that the Eastern Railroad Association is made up of railroad interests in different portions of the country, and that in repeated instances during half a dozen years, perhaps, when he brought suits at different times, the Eastern Railroad Association has fraudulently defeated the purposes of his bill.

Now the petitioner comes to Congress alleging that after a series of years and a number of different efforts, he has been unable to procure justice in the courts by reason of the fraudulent interference of the Eastern Railroad Association, and he makes the following prayer:

> That Congress, by joint resolution, shall direct the Attorney-General of the United States to enforce section 4 of the Sherman antitrust law in the United States circuit courts for the district of Connecticut and the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and against the Eastern Railroad Association.

Then the petitioner asks for various other methods of relief. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BATE presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of Nashville, Tenn., praying for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of the United States Government; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition of 2,500 citizens of California, praying for the enactment of legislation excluding all foreign labor from this country for the next ten years; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the memorial of Enos Goodrich, of Tuscola County, Mich., remonstrating against the protection of manufactures of woolen goods while wool is on the free list; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of C. A. Johnson and sundry other citizens of Pinconning, Mich.; of C. F. Gibson and sundry other citizens of Detroit, Mich., and of F. D. Cogswell and 75 other citizens of New York, remonstrating against the support of the Government in maintaining the present system of sectarian Indian education, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AWARDS OF QUADRO-CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas statements have been made by reputable persons that injustice has been done to many exhibitors at the late Quadro-Centennial Exposition in making the awards and that the action of the committee on awards appointed by the commissioners of said Exposition from their own number has been characterized by undue favoritism, oppression, irregularity, and improper practices, and

Whereas application has been made to Congress for such legislation as will give relief to exhibitors alleged to have been so injured, such legislation being also recommended by the president of the Quadro-Centennial Exposition: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Quadro-Centennial be instructed to investigate all the facts touching such charges and especially the conduct of the Quadro-Centennial Commission, or of any committee appointed by said commission, and of all officials, exhibitors, or other persons, in regard to making said awards, and as to any other matter connected with said Exposition.

That the said committee or any subcommittee appointed by it shall have power to sit during the vacation of Congress either in Chicago or Washington City, as may be deemed best, and may employ a stenographer and may send for persons and papers; the expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether immigrants, who by law are excluded from entering the United States, are entering the country from either European or Chinese ports by way of Canada; whether the steamship lines between European and Canadian ports are subject to the same regulations as to landing immigrants destined for the United States as are steamship lines to the ports of the United States; whether the inspection of immigrants entering the United States from Canada is efficient in enforcing the laws of the United States concerning immigration; and, if inefficient, whether it is the fault of administration, or whether further legislation on the subject is necessary or desirable.

THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire—

First. Whether that provision of the naturalization laws requiring that an applicant for naturalization should be "a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same," is a condition of admission to the same; and whether, after naturalization has been granted, the same may be recalled if it shall turn out that said naturalized person has so acted as to show that he is not a man of good moral character, or that he is not attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, or is not well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same.

Second. That if it shall be ascertained that no such recall of the grant of naturalization can be made as is mentioned in the first resolution, then they shall inquire into the expediency of so amending the law as to provide for such recall as to persons hereafter naturalized.

Third. What new provisions, if any, are necessary to secure a compliance with the law in relation to proof of good character and attachment to the principles of the Constitution of the United States in applicants for naturalization.

Fourth. Whether it is expedient to require by law that ability to read the Constitution of the United States shall be a necessary qualification for naturalization hereafter.

Fifth. Whether it is expedient to require notice to be given of every application for naturalization, to the end that an officer representing the United States may appear and make due contest of the right of any applicant to be naturalized.

2. Resolved, That said committee, after making said inquiry, shall report by bill if they deem any amendment to the naturalization laws to be expedient.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT DUBUQUE, IOWA.

The bill (H. R. 7498) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River from a point within the limits of the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, known as Eagle Point, to the opposite bank of said river, in the county of Grant and State of Wisconsin, was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. This is the exact counterpart of a bill which passed the Senate last Friday, and which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce. I ask that the House bill may be now taken up and considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill was read at length in the Senate before, but perhaps it had better be read again.

The Secretary read the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN ENGAGEMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution returned on the request of the Senate by the Secretary of War. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the letter of the Secretary of War be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication from the Secretary of War will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., July 14, 1894.

SIR: In response to a resolution of the Senate, dated July 13, 1894, I have the honor to return Senate resolution dated July 6, 1894, directing the furnishing to the Senate of a statement, in detailed form, of all engagements between the United States Army and hostile Indians from January 1, 1850, to June 30, 1894, and from the foundation of the Government to January 1, 1850.

Very respectfully,

DANIEL S. LAMONT, Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not see the Senator from Kentucky present. Let the resolution lie over until he comes in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator from Kentucky has entered a motion to reconsider the resolution, and the Chair supposed the Senator was in the Chamber. It will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Kentucky explained the reasons for reconsideration at the time he entered the motion; that he had ascertained that the cost of executing the request of the Senate would greatly exceed the value of the information to be obtained, and that he thought it was better to withdraw the request.

Mr. LINDSAY entered the Chamber.

Mr. VILAS. I see the Senator from Kentucky is now present, and he can explain for himself.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask that the resolution be laid over. I have no further information from the Department in regard to the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think there is no objection to disposing of the resolution. I understand it would take six months or a year, and probably would require the employment of fifty or one hundred clerks, to get up the data the resolution calls for.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am perfectly willing to have the vote by which the resolution was passed reconsidered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I refer to that part of the resolution which calls for the information from the foundation of the Government to 1850.

Mr. LINDSAY. I wish to reconsider all of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion to reconsider the resolution will be regarded as agreed to, and the resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 13th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1045) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate four obsolete gun carriages to the city of Marshalltown, Iowa; and

An act (S. 2070) to provide for the restoration to the State of Michigan two flags carried by the Twenty-second Michigan Infantry Volunteers, and now in the War Department.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 16th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1573) making appropriations for rewriting the Consular Regulations.

RESURVEY OF GRANT AND HOOKER COUNTIES, NEBR.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6720) providing for the resurvey of Grant and Hooker Counties, in the State of Nebraska. I think it will lead to no discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair the present bona fide claim of any actual occupant of any of said lands to the lands so occupied.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the bill be read as it is proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill as it is proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be made a resurvey of the lands in Grant and Hooker Counties, in the State of Nebraska; and all rules and regulations of the Interior Department requiring petitions from all settlers of said counties asking for resurvey and agreement to abide by the result of the same are hereby abrogated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair the present bona fide claim of any actual occupant of any of said lands to the lands so occupied.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator who is in charge of the bill whether the provision requiring settlers of the counties where a resurvey is made to join in a petition and agree to abide by the resurvey is abrogated in toto by this bill, or only for this purpose?

Mr. ALLEN. Only for this purpose.

Mr. HALE. Let that part of the bill be read again. I thought it was a general abrogation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

And all rules and regulations of the Interior Department requiring petitions from all settlers of said counties asking for resurvey and agreement to abide by the result of the same are hereby abrogated.

Mr. HALE. That is a general abrogation. I think there should be inserted "for the purposes of this act."

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that the rule of the Interior Department, so far as these lands are concerned, is abrogated, but in no other respect.

Mr. HALE. I move to insert the words "so far as these lands are concerned, are hereby abrogated." Then it will only apply to purposes of the bill and will not be a total abrogation of the law.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not understand that there is any law upon the subject. It is a mere rule of the Interior Department, and the purpose of this bill is simply to suspend the rule of the Interior Department in so far as it applies to this resurvey.

Mr. HALE. The abrogation should only apply to these lands.

Mr. ALLEN. The rule may be abrogated in so far as it applies to the resurvey of these lands.

Mr. HALE. Let the words I suggest be inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "same," in line 8, it is proposed to insert "so far as these land are concerned, are hereby abrogated."

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the necessity for this resurvey?

Mr. ALLEN. The necessity for the resurvey is simply that the survey of those counties has been very imperfect, and the settlers have not been able to ascertain the proper boundaries of their lands. The former survey makes irregular pieces of land. The counties there are now very sparsely settled, there probably not being two hundred citizens resident in both counties. The settlers, with the exception of some thirteen or fourteen, are desirous of having the resurvey before their lands are patented. There are a few who will not join in an application for a resurvey. The bill is for the purpose of abrogating the rule of the Department in so far as it applies to these counties, so that the majority may have their land resurveyed.

Mr. HALE. I am not at odds with the Senator at all on the general purposes of the bill. The words I have suggested will make it apply only to these counties.

Mr. ALLEN. I was simply answering the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine stated.

Mr. HALE. Let it be read with the context.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; let it be read with the context, so that we may understand it.

The Secretary read as follows:

And all rules and regulations of the Interior Department requiring petitions from all settlers of said counties asking for resurvey and agreement to abide by the result of the same, so far as these lands are concerned, are hereby abrogated.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand my colleague to have accepted the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is no question of the fact that the rule of the Department—and it may be a rule of law as well as of the Department—is one that is based in sound wisdom and good judgment. As to this particular case, however, it certainly should be abrogated. Both my colleague and I have been receiving letters in large numbers, and, as far as I am concerned, for several years my attention has been called to the ill condition of the public lands in Grant and Hooker Counties. The only thing I fear is—and I call the attention of my colleague to this fact—that unless there is a specific appropriation in this bill for the purpose of this resurvey it may avail us nothing. Of course, the general survey appropriation that is in the general appropriation bill is a lump sum, and is to be expended under the direction and entire control of the Secretary of the Interior, directing the General Land Office. What I fear is that if we do not have a specific appropriation in this bill, which is one of value and importance, we shall not get what we desire.

Mr. ALLEN. If my colleague will permit me, I will say that I have offered an amendment, which is now pending before the Committee on Appropriations, making an appropriation for the specific purpose of resurveying these lands, and I feel confident the committee will report favorably upon it.

Mr. MANDERSON. This, however, is a House bill.

Mr. ALLEN. This is a House bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. If my colleague would move to amend so as to place upon this bill an appropriation of any amount, not otherwise appropriated, sufficient for this purpose, then, if we should fail in the general appropriation bill in conference, we still perhaps, in the conference on this bill, might get what we desire.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I suggest at the conclusion of the proviso there be inserted "and that the sum of $15,000 "——

Mr. MANDERSON. Or so much thereof as may be necessary——

Mr. ALLEN. "Or whatever part thereof may be sufficient, is hereby appropriated to carry out the provision of this act."

Mr. MANDERSON. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add:

And the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PASCO. I move that the Senate ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLEN, Mr. PASCO, and Mr. DUBOIS were appointed.

GEORGE P. FURBER.

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which was reported originally from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, authorizing the payment of $750 to George P. Furber for work in the preparation of the second edition of Senate Election Cases. It will take only a moment to dispose of the resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, which was reported by Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, July 2, 1894:

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid to George P. Furber, from the contingent fund of the Senate, $750, as compensation for his services in the preparation of the second edition of Senate Election Cases and the volume entitled Privileges of the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. I merely desire to say that the matter has been before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and was duly considered. The committee think that the sum stated is moderate. The work has been done, and the volume is an important one. We think the compensation stated in the resolution ought to be paid.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAY INSPECTOR JOHN H. STEVENSON.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1211, for the relief of Pay Inspector John H. Stevenson. It will excite no opposition and will take but little time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1211) for the relief of Pay Inspector John H. Stevenson, of the United States Navy. It proposes to transfer Pay Inspector John H. Stevenson, of the retired list of the United States Navy, from the half-pay list to the 75-per-cent pay list of retired officers, under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MELBOURNE INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2024) authorizing additional compensation to the assistant commissioners to the industrial exhibition held at Melbourne, Australia. It is a short bill, and I am satisfied that it will give rise to no discussion.
